Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Claims, reported adversely the bill (H. R. 37) for the relief of the estate of C. H. Ireland, deceased; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS REFERRED TO COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. WOOD, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 3257) to authorize the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claims of certain persons named therein; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SALMON B. COLBY.

Mr. GEDDES, from the Committee on War Claims, reported adversely the bill (H. R. 4194) for the relief of the heirs of Salmon B. Colby, deceased; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

INTEREST ON WAR LOANS BY STATES.

Mr. ROWELL. I am directed by the Committee on War Claims to report back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 2463) to reimburse the several States for interest paid on war loans, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is a public bill; none but private bills are in order at this time.

Mr. ROWELL. Then I will withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can withdraw it and report it at some other time.

JOHN W. FRANKLIN.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 1473) for the relief of John W. Franklin, executor of the last will of John Armfield, deceased; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

W. W. M'DOWELL.

Mr. TULLY, from the Committee on War Claims, reported adversely the bill (H. R. 1538) for the relief of W. W. McDowell, administrator of the estate of Thomas Jones, deceased; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MICHAEL KREIS.

Mr. TULLY, from the Committee on War Claims, also reported adversely the bill (H. R. 1839) for the relief of Michael Kreis; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

FRANK H. NICHOLS.

Mr. TULLY, from the Committee on War Claims, also reported adversely the bill (H. R. 3573) for the relief of Frank H. Nichols; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HENRY MARTIN.

Mr. WEAVER, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 4966) for the relief of Henry Martin; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. McCOMAS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 3813) to amend the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

The call of committees was continued and concluded, no further reports being presented.

RELIEF OF VOLUNTEER OFFICERS.

Mr. LAIRD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 1251, a bill (H. R. 6255) for the relief of certain officers of the volunteer army, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and committed to the Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair), and proceeded to the consideration of the Private Calendar.

JOHN P. GREGSON.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 257) for the relief of John P. Gregson.

Mr. TALBOTT. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS], who reported this bill from the Committee on Naval Affairs, is now absent. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. If this bill is now to be considered I desire to say a word upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over informally. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ASSISTANT ENGINEER JOHN W. SAVILLE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2240) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Assistant Engineer John W. Saville a passed assistant engineer on the retired-list of the Navy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Assistant Engineer John W. Saville, of the United States Navy, a passed assistant engineer in the Navy, to date with his class on the active-list, and that he be placed on the retired-list of the Navy with the highest rate of retired-pay of that grade from the date he was retired as an assistant engineer.

Mr. BALLENTINE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman asking the act of justice proposed to be done him by this bill entered the service October 28, 1862, as third assistant engineer. He was wounded at Fort Fisher, on board the United States steamer Canonicus, and was again wounded in the first engagement with the Albemarle, on the Roanoke, near Plymouth, N. C. He superintended the construction of the machinery of the United States steamer Monocacy at Baltimore, and proceeded to China on duty on that vessel. Having served three years at sea, he was, on the 15th of March, 1867, entitled to promotion to the grade of passed assistant engineer. His class was promoted on the 1st of January, 1868, at which time he was still attached to the steamer Monocacy in the East Indies.

At that time he made application to the admiral commanding the squadron to be ordered home for examination for promotion, and the application was denied on the sole ground that his services could not be dispensed with. At that time, as all the testimony shows, he was fitted physically to pass the required examination.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is this officer now on the retired-list?

Mr. BALLENTINE. Yes, sir, he was retired in 1871 as a second assistant engineer.

Mr. STEELE. Then this bill is merely to give him promotion?

Mr. BALLENTINE. Yes, sir; he asks now to be retired upon the same grade that his class took in 1868.

Mr. STEELE. You want to make the bill retroactive—to go back to the time he was retired?

Mr. BALLENTINE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the report should be read.

The report was read, as follows:

We find the facts in the case to be as follows:

Mr. Saville entered the service October 28, 1862, as third assistant engineer. He was wounded at Fort Fisher, on board the United States steamer Canonicus, and was again wounded in the first engagement with the Albemarle, on the Roanoke, near Plymouth, N. C. He superintended the construction of the machinery of the United States steamer Monocacy at Baltimore, and proceeded to China on duty on that vessel. Having served out the three years of sea-service March 15, 1867, he was entitled to promotion to passed assistant engineer. His class was not promoted until January 1, 1868, at which time he was still attached to the United States steamer Monocacy in the East Indies.

He made application to Admiral Rowan, commanding the squadron, to be ordered home for examination for promotion, but his application was denied on the ground that his services could not be dispensed with. The testimony shows that at the time of the application and for some time subsequent he was physically fitted to pass the required examination.

He was continued on duty in the East Indies twenty-eight months and nine days after he was entitled to the promotion asked for, during the latter portion of which time his health became impaired while in the line of duty, and he was finally ordered home sick, and placed on the retired-list February 1, 1871, as second assistant engineer, with the highest rate of pay of that grade, as physically disqualified for duty on the active-list, on the ground that his disability arose from sickness contracted in the line of duty.

The surgeon of the Monocacy states that Mr. Saville's health was good during the cruise on that vessel from 1866 until a few months before his return to the United States, and that he could have passed his physical examination had it been ordered.

This testimony is corroborated by the acting assistant engineer, who was at that time attached to the Monocacy, and also by Philip Miller, late second assistant engineer on the same vessel.

The testimony of Ezra J. Whittaker, chief engineer, United States Navy, shows that he was ordered to the Monocacy on the 4th of September, 1867, as engineer in charge, and that Mr. Saville was on board and on duty at that time; that he remained on duty until June, 1869, when he was taken sick and detached by medical survey and ordered home; that his health was good from 1867 to 1869, and he knows no reason why he could not have passed a medical examination for promotion. The naval retiring board, before which he appeared, reported that in its judgment he was incapacitated for active duty, and that his disability arose from exposure, and consequent illness, in the line of his duty.

As before stated, his application to be detached was refused by Rear-Admiral Rowan on the sole ground that his services could not be dispensed with. On the 21st of January, 1871, by direction of the Secretary of the Navy, he was ordered to proceed to Washington and report to the president of the retiring board, and was by action of that board discharged.

On full and careful consideration of all the facts, as developed by the evidence in this case, your committee are of the opinion that John W. Saville should be appointed a passed assistant engineer in the Navy, to date with his class on the active-list, and that he be placed on the retired-list of the Navy with the highest rate of retired pay of that grade from the date he was retired as assistant engineer, and therefore recommend the passage of House bill 2240 accompanying this report.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BALLENTINE] a question or two touching the facts in this case, inasmuch as the report does not seem to be very full. As I understand, this officer was retired in 1871 and is now on the retired-list?

Mr. BALLENTINE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I do not understand the meaning of the statement in the report that in 1871 he was ordered to this city for examination and was by action of the retiring board discharged. I hope the Clerk will again read that part of the report.

The Clerk (by the direction of the chairman) again read a portion of the report.

Mr. TALBOTT. Mr. Chairman, the circumstances of the present case are these: This officer served at sea for the period he was required to serve under the law—three years and more. During the time he was absent at sea he was entitled to be examined for promotion, and promotion would have made him a passed assistant engineer.

But he was kept on the station and was not allowed to come home until after the time had expired when he was entitled to be retired as a passed assistant engineer. When he did come home at last he was put upon the retired-list because he was physically unable to stand the examination. All this does is to promote this officer from an assistant to be a passed assistant engineer upon the retired-list, and to give him pay on the retired-list as passed assistant engineer, at which he would have been retired had he not been kept on duty at the time he was entitled to be examined for promotion.

Mr. STEELE. The report says that on the 21st of January, 1871, by direction of the Secretary of the Navy, he was ordered to proceed to Washington and report to the president of the retiring board, and was by action of that board discharged. Now, what is the meaning of that term "discharged?"

Mr. BALLENTINE. He was retired.

Mr. HOLMAN. The question I wish to ask is this: The object of this bill is to increase the compensation of this officer. Now, what is his present salary and income from the Government, and if this bill passes what will be the effect, how much will it increase his salary?

Mr. BALLENTINE. He is receiving now, as I understand, three-fourths of $1,900 a year, the highest pay of an assistant engineer. He asks you shall give him what the committee find he is justly entitled to, three-fourths of the highest pay of a passed assistant engineer, or three-fourths of $2,000. It is an act of pure and simple justice.

Mr. STEELE. I move the following amendment: To strike out the words "from the date he was retired as an assistant engineer" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "to date from and after the passage of this act."

The bill proposes to place this man upon the retired-list, or rather to promote a man on the retired-list, and, furthermore, that he shall receive the difference between the pay of his present rank and the rank to which he is to be promoted for ten years. If it be the fact that under the law this officer really was entitled to this promotion he would undoubtedly have received it under the regulations of the Navy Department. However, if the House in its wisdom should choose to pass this bill, I think we ought to strike off that portion which makes it retroactive for ten years. I hope my amendment will be adopted by the friends of the bill.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. The complete answer to the gentleman from Indiana is contained in the report made by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BALLENTINE]. That report informs the House that at the time his class was promoted and when he was entitled to be examined for promotion he made application to Admiral Rowan, who commanded the United States squadron in the East Indies. That request was denied for the reason that his services could not be dispensed with. He was therefore continued on duty in the East Indies for twenty-eight months and nine days after he was entitled to the promotion asked for. He was kept there at the instance of the commander of the squadron because his services could not be dispensed with.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Why was he not promoted when he returned?

Mr. HOBLITZELL. The report stated that during the latter portion of his time—that is, the twenty-eight months and nine days he was detained in the East Indies after he was entitled to the promotion asked for—his health became impaired while in the line of duty, and he was finally ordered home sick, and placed on the retired-list February 1, 1871, as second assistant engineer, with the highest rate of pay of that grade, as physically disqualified for duty on the active-list, on the ground that his disability arose from sickness contracted in the line of duty.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. How much does this officer now receive?

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Fourteen hundred and twenty-five dollars.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. How much will he receive if he receives this promotion?

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I am advised he will receive $1,480——

Mr. BALLENTINE. If the bill is passed he will receive in the aggregate $880——

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The difference, then, is about $50——

Mr. HOBLITZELL. About $55——

Mr. BALLENTINE. He is now receiving $1,425, three-fourths of the highest sea-pay of an assistant engineer, which is $1,900. He asks you shall give him three-fourths of the highest sea-pay of passed assistant engineer, which he was entitled to if he had received his promotion.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Somewhere about $1,500——

Mr. BALLENTINE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. You allow him this pay for how many years back?

Mr. TALBOTT. About thirteen.

Mr. BALLENTINE. Say thirteen years.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. There is but very little in it.

Mr. BALLENTINE. There is but very little in it, but it is an act of pure, simple justice to this officer.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. There is hardly enough in it to pay for establishing such a bad precedent.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE].

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 45.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on reporting the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass as amended.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 82, noes 9.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am opposed to passing questions of this character with only a fraction of a quorum, but I do not make the point if it is the understanding that we shall have a vote on this matter in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not decide that question. The rules fix it.

So (no further count being demanded) the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES H. AYERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 723) for the relief of James H. Ayers.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the claim of James H. Ayers, of Maryland, for services and expenses incurred in rendering aid to the Light-House Board in the month of April, 1862, is hereby referred to the Court of Claims, with power to adjudicate the same on its merits, without regard to any technical defense, and to allow such interest as to the said court shall appear equitable and proper.

The committee recommend the following amendment:

Strike out the words "without regard to any technical defense and to allow such interest as to the said court shall appear equitable and proper" and insert: "Provided, That such claim shall be filed within twelve months after the passage of this act, and not otherwise."

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

Your committee, having considered said bill, would respectfully report the same back with amendments, and recommend its passage when so amended.

Mr. STEELE. If there is no further explanation of this bill I move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. The circumstances under which this bill is recommended favorably are these——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the motion to strike out the enacting clause is not debatable.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I did not understand that motion to be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided again and again that it is not debatable.

Mr. McMILLIN. My understanding of the motion of the gentleman from Indiana is that it was conditional; that unless there was further explanation he would make the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must recognize the motion of the gentleman to strike out the enacting clause without any condition.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. That motion was made subject to a condition. Now, I am about to explain to the gentleman the reason why the bill should pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not make the motion subject to any qualification.

Mr. STEELE. I simply ask an explanation of the report. If there is no further report or explanation, then I shall make the motion.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. If you will withdraw the motion I will explain what it is.

Mr. McMILLIN. I make the point of order that if the motion is made with a condition it is not a motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must recognize the motion unless it is withdrawn.

Mr. STEELE. I will withdraw the motion to hear an explanation of the bill.

Mr. PRICE. This report, Mr. Chairman, I will state, was among the early reports made by the Committee on Claims, and at that time it was not understood that the reasons which prompted the committee in its action on the bills should be set forth fully in the reports.

The facts of this case are simply these: The beneficiary of this bill claims to have done some valuable service to the Government for which he has not been paid, and the claim is in such a condition as to time that he could not get it into the Court of Claims for adjudication. This bill simply asks that he may have the right to go into the Court of Claims and have his claim adjudicated on its merits. He asks that this may be done and the court consider his claim without regard to any technical defense that may exist by reason of the delay, and also that such rate of interest be allowed on the claim as the court may determine to be just and proper.

The committee recommended the striking out of that provision of the bill in reference to technical defense and with reference to interest, and subject the claim to the condition that it shall be filed within twelve months after the passage of the act.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I wish to find out, if the gentleman can inform me, if this party has a claim against the Government.

Mr. PRICE. We think he has a claim against the Government, but want it inquired into judicially by the Court of Claims.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I would like to know what the claim is.

Mr. PRICE. It is for services rendered in taking care of a lighthouse in Maryland in 1862. I will state to the gentleman that the proof was very plain to the committee that the services had been rendered.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. The claim of James H. Ayers was offered in the Forty-sixth Congress, and was favorably reported by the committee having charge of it. It was not presented to the Forty-seventh Congress, and when the general law was passed allowing all of these claims to be submitted to the Court of Claims this was not among the claims which were included under the provisions of that act. It could not receive the benefits of the general law for the reason that it had not been pending in the Forty-seventh Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no report accompanying this case——

Mr. HOBLITZELL. There is a report.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point of order I make is that there is no report in the proper sense of the term, and there being no report, that we ought to have an opportunity of hearing at least an explanation of it from some gentleman on the floor. I ask, therefore, that there be order upon the floor while the gentleman from Maryland is explaining the provisions of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has been endeavoring to preserve order upon the floor and will insist that gentlemen must take their seats, and public business will be suspended until they do so.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I was endeavoring to explain to the committee that this claim of James H. Ayers had been considered before a committee of the Forty-sixth Congress. It presents a claim for valuable services rendered during the war to the Government. That claim did not pass that Congress, although favorably reported, and was not presented to the Forty-seventh Congress when the general law was passed referring all private claims of that character to the Court of Claims. This bill was offered in the terms in which it originally went to the committee to give him the same privileges accorded to claims pending in the Forty-seventh Congress under the general law. That is all there is of it.

Mr. STORM. Let me ask the gentleman whether under the Bowman bill he regards it as the duty of the committee to investigate these claims to the extent of determining that the party has a valid claim against the Government, or is it the intention to relieve the committee of that duty and refer the claims to the Court of Claims for investigation?

Mr. HOBLITZELL. In the present instance the committee examined this case thoroughly and was satisfied as to its merit.

Mr. STORM. The object of my question was to ascertain whether it is to be determined by the committee that there is a valid claim in law before the reference to the Court of Claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, with all due deference to the gentlemen who make this report, the point of order should have been made in the first instance that it is not a report within the meaning of the term. The report accompanying the bill is a document of public interest presenting the facts upon which members are to vote. This report is in the following language:

Your committee, having considered said bill, would respectfully report the same back with amendments, and recommend its passage when so amended.

Is that a report within the spirit of the rule of this House? Does that furnish us any information whatever? Can a member of the House be called upon or ought he to be called upon to vote blindly without any knowledge of the public matters which are to be affected by his vote? I, for one, protest against this practice. The committee in its action here is without a guide. If no other information is furnished to the House touching a matter of public concern, then I think the motion made by my colleague was an eminently proper motion in view of the fact that the House has no information in any degree of the nature or merits of this claim. Now, my friend from Maryland does not explain what the claim is.

Why was not the claim filed in the regular course of the administration of the proper department to which the subject belonged? If it is a valid claim against the Government and does not require some equitable interposition, why does it not come in under the Bowman act passed in the Forty-seventh Congress? Why not let it go to the Court of Claims by simple resolution of the committee of which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] is chairman? It was hoped that bill would furnish Congress some relief from the consideration of claims of this kind.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would state to my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that it is within the power of the House now to do that which he suggests; and if the House prefers that the claim shall take that course, the Committee on Claims has no objection. I would state also that that would in all probability be the best course for the claimant, because if the claim is referred to the Court of Claims under the Bowman act he does not have to give any security for costs. This report is in the nature of additional security to the Government, because while the bill was introduced authorizing him to go to the Court of Claims without bond for costs, the committee saw fit to require him to give bonds for costs. A stringency is placed on this claimant that is not placed by the general law upon those having similar claims.

I know of no reason, if it is the will of the House, why the House may not send the case to the Court of Claims under the Bowman act. The gentleman who introduced the bill has no objection to that; the committee has none. The committee took the action it did simply by way of giving additional security to the Government in the matter. If the gentleman from Indiana wants to refer the case to the Court of Claims under the Bowman act, I have no objection. I suppose that would be an equitable way to dispose of it.

Mr. PRICE rose.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] proceeds, I wish to make a suggestion.

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman can make it after I get through.

I understand the question before the Committee of the Whole is, shall this bill be sent back to the House with the recommendation that it pass? To this proposition the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] interposes what seems to be the insuperable objection in his mind that this ought not to be done, for the reason that the report is not in proper form. Now I understand it to be duty of any committee to report their conclusion upon any measure that has been referred to them; and they may or may not add the reasons that have led them to that conclusion. But the gentleman says this is not a report under the rule. I demand of the gentleman from Indiana that he shall point out the rule that requires not only the conclusion of the committee to be stated, but also the facts upon which that conclusion is reached, or else I demand that he abandon the proposition that this is not a report at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. I said nothing about the paper. My friend misapprehends——

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman distinctly stated the report was not in form, and therefore was no report at all. Gentlemen all around me heard him say so.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman misapprehends.

Mr. PRICE. I do not misapprehend.

Mr. HOLMAN. I had no occasion to discuss the question of the form of the paper. It was the substance of it I alluded to. It is the absence of substance I complain of.

What information is furnished to this House? Up to this moment not a member of the Committee on Claims has informed the Committee of the Whole even as to the nature of the claim. The gentleman from Wisconsin himself has not thought proper to enlighten us as to the nature of this claim. What is the claim about? The object of a report is to furnish some information, not to give merely the conclusion of the committee. And I think my friend from Wisconsin will find there has been more than once a ruling on just such reports that they are not reports within the ruling of the House.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman show me the rule to which he refers?

Mr. HOLMAN. The report should at least contain some statement of the facts. If my colleague from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] should not renew his motion to strike out the enacting clause, I propose to offer a resolution to refer this case to the Court of Claims. And I wish to explain, as my friend from Wisconsin became a little excited——

Mr. PRICE. Not in the least.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to explain that I can readily understand that my friend may have made such a report in consequence of the great hurry of business. I know how that committee is oppressed with its business.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Indiana is mistaken as to anything being done by that committee in a hurry.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish only further to state that the difference between the passage of the bill and the adoption of the resolution is that the one gives jurisdiction beyond the Bowman act and the other does not. I offer this resolution:

Resolved, That the pending bill be referred to the Court of Claims.

Mr. McMILLIN. We have no objection to the bill taking that course. In fact I am inclined to think that is the best course.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be referred to the Court of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

SURETIES OF THE LATE J. O. RAWLINS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 116) for the relief of the sureties of the late J. O. Rawlins.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Henry Fairfax Williams, Moses Rosenbaum, Henry Voorman, George Schultz, Roswell Percival Clement, Andrew Anderson Londerback, Alonzo Hayward, Anson Parsons Hotaling, Loed Livingston, and John Nelson Risdon, sureties of J. O. Rawlins, late collector of internal revenue for the first district of California, by bond to the United States dated May 6, in the year of our Lord 1869, be, and they are hereby, released from their liability arising from any deficiency that may have occurred in the accounts of said collector during the term covered by the transcripts of accounts from the Treasury Department, and from any judgment which may have been obtained thereon in favor of the United States; and the proper officer of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to direct the dismissal of any and all suits that may have been instituted and are now pending against the sureties aforesaid upon said bond.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. The report of the Committee on Claims in this case occupies about three pages of pretty closely printed matter; and I beg to say that the merits of the bill commended themselves to the committee to such an extent that it received a unanimous report in favor of recommending its passage. This same claim was before the last Congress and was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will not call for the reading of the report if the gentleman will speak so that members can hear what he says in explanation of the bill.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. I will endeavor to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. Members of the Committee will maintain order, so that the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN ALSTYNE] can be heard.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. I was remarking that the merits of this bill commended themselves to the Committee on Claims to such an extent that it received the unanimous expression of the full committee in its favor, and they recommend its passage by the House. The same matter was before the last Congress, and was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and received the favorable action of that committee. The Committee on Claims of this House have adopted the report of the Committee on the Judiciary of the last House, both as to the statement of facts and the conclusions arrived at.

The facts upon which this claim is based are simply these: In 1869 John O. Rawlins, of the city of San Francisco, was appointed by the Treasury Department collector of internal revenue for the first district of that State. He entered upon the duties of his office in May of that year. He gave the gentlemen, who are the beneficiaries of this bill, as his sureties upon his official bond. Mr. Rawlins was in every sense a proper man for the place to which he was appointed. His character was unexceptionable, his business qualifications were superior, and he was attentive and faithful in the performance of his duties.

In October of that year, while inspecting a unique piece of machinery, he received a serious injury, which confined him to his bed. He never recovered from it to the extent of being able to leave his house, and he died on the 8th of the following month. He had several clerks in his office, and at the time he was injured he placed one of those clerks in charge to superintend the duties of the office.

Upon his death the Treasury Department did not fill the vacancy, but did take upon itself to supersede the clerk who had been placed in charge of the office by Mr. Rawlins and to designate another, without the knowledge or assent in any sense of these sureties, to conduct the business, and he was permitted to conduct the affairs of the office from that time until the last of April of the following year, when the office was filled by another appointment.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. How long after the death of Mr. Rawlins was that appointment made?

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. The change in the clerk to superintend the office was made a little over a month after the death of Mr. Rawlins; and the duties of the office were discharged by the person put in charge by the Treasury Department for something over three months.

By reason of the death of Mr. Rawlins, his official accounts were not settled for about a period of three years. When that settlement was finally made there was found to be an apparent deficiency of about $30,000. The Government took no action in regard to the matter for some seven years thereafter. About ten years after the death of Mr. Rawlins the Government brought suit on the official bond against the beneficiaries of this bill as sureties of Mr. Rawlins, and the matter was tried in the court.

All the defenses were set up which were maintainable under the law. It was shown on the trial that a part of the apparent deficiency consisted in the supposed payment of a tax by C. Jost & Co., in the sum of $8,764.

The testimony offered showed that this receipt, which was in the handwriting of the person designated by the Treasury Department, young Witbeck, deputy collector in the office, who was comparatively a mere youth, inexperienced and subject to the malign influences of a great town, was given after he, Witbeck, had passed from the charge of the office, and without any payment having been made. The court did not hesitate to instruct the jury that so far as that item of the apparent deficiency was concerned it should be allowed and deducted from the amount of the claim. A recovery was had against the bondsmen in the sum of $22,117 18, with interest.

No action has been taken on the part of the officers of the Government to enforce this judgment. The reason for that is that they do not believe they could do so in justice to these defendants; that Rawlins himself was not in any respect responsible for the deficiency; that these defendants were free from any fault or blame, and that whatever accident did occur, whatever misappropriation was made, whatever improper act was done in the giving of receipts without the actual payment of money, was through this man Witbeck, who was designated by the Treasury Department. Therefore the officers of the Government have withheld any action to endeavor to enforce the judgment.

The judge who tried this case speaks upon the subject of it and says:

The transcript of accounts covers a period of eleven months, and shows collections amounting to $3,122,135.60. For half of the time, or five and a half months, Rawlins was able to give his personal attention to the duties of his office.

He was then so badly injured that he could not attend to any business, and the office was managed by one of the deputy collectors for a period of about two months.

Rawlins having then died, the Secretary of the Treasury designated and directed another deputy collector to act as collector until the appointment of a collector by the President of the United States.

The interim covered a period of three and a half months, and it is claimed, not without reasonable grounds, that during this time, or later, the mischief occurred that resulted in the deficiency.

Without reading in detail the statements of the judge I will give his conclusion:

I therefore believe it to be just and proper for Congress to relieve the defendants from all liability on account of the judgment rendered against them in this case.

That recommendation on the part of the judge is concurred in by the United States prosecuting attorney, Philip Teare. The judge who presided at the trial was Lorenzo Sawyer. The recommendation of the judge is also concurred in by eleven of the jurors who tried the case. Why the twelfth juror did not concur in it I do not know, unless it was owing to his absence or his death.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that this is one of those cases of liability which are liable to occur in the discharge of official duty without any fault on the part of the principal; and where, as is unfortunately the fact in this case, the liability attaches to gentlemen who are not in any just sense responsible and affects them most seriously, a measure of relief such as is presented in this case ought to receive not only the favorable but the prompt action of Congress.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Do I understand that the evidence discloses the probability that this deficiency all occurred subsequently to the death of Rawlins?

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Subsequently to the death of Rawlins and during the time the office was in charge of a clerk designated by the Treasury Department.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. How is it possible that the sureties could be held responsible for a defalcation which occurred after the death of their principal?

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. For the reason that the business of the office was continued under the appointment of Mr. Rawlins himself; and the suit upon the bond covered the entire period from the original appointment of Mr. Rawlins until that appointment was superseded by a new appointment on the part of the Government.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Then it was held that the death of the principal did not abolish the agency?

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. It was so held by the court which tried the case.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. That was a rather strange conclusion.

Mr. MCMILLIN. With the permission of my friend from New York [Mr. VAN ALSTYNE]——

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Certainly.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will state for the information of my friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] that there was no evidence showing with absolute certainty at what time exactly the defalcation did occur. But though that is true, yet from the upright conduct of the deceased officer, and the fact that the employé who was put in charge of the office did after his discharge forge receipts to the amount of eight or nine thousand dollars, which were sought to be made a charge upon this bond, it is at least presumable that the defalcation occurred during the time that employé was in charge of the office.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I should think the death of the principal revoked the agency.

Mr. HOLMAN. My colleague [Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana] will notice that he puts the case too broadly. It is not claimed that the whole defalcation occurred after the death of the principal; but rather, as stated by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], it is presumed to have occurred then.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And that presumption is founded on the fact that a forgery by this man who was in charge was detected.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. There was actually detected a forgery to the amount of $8,764.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And the balance could not be traced with certainty.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the strong recommendation of the judge who tried the case ought to be quite potential in a matter of this kind.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The recommendation comes not only from the judge but also from eleven jurors.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

RELIEF FROM CHARGE OF DESERTION.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3935) to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the charge of desertion now standing on the rolls and records in the office of the Adjutant-General of the United States against any soldier who served in the late war in the volunteer service shall be removed in all cases where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, from such rolls and records, or from other satisfactory testimony, that any such soldier served faithfully until the expiration of his term of enlistment, or until the 22d day of May, A. D. 1865, or was prevented from completing his term of service by reason of wounds received or disease contracted in the line of duty, but who, by reason of absence from his command at the time the same was mustered out, failed to be mustered out and to receive an honorable discharge.

SEC. 2. That the charge of desertion standing on the rolls and records in the office of the Adjutant-General of the United States against any soldier who served in the late war in the volunteer service shall also be removed in all cases where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, from such rolls and records, or from other satisfactory testimony, that such soldier charged with desertion or with absence without leave, after such charge of desertion or absence without leave, voluntarily returned to his command, or who subsequently enlisted in another regiment or company and served in the line of his duty until he was mustered out of the service, and received a certificate of honorable discharge.

SEC. 3. That in all cases where the charge of desertion shall be removed under the provisions of this act from the record of any soldier who has not received a certificate of discharge, it shall be the duty of the Adjutant-General of the United States to issue to such soldier, or in case of his death to his heirs or legal representatives, a certificate of discharge.

SEC. 4. That when the charge of desertion shall be removed under the provisions of this act from the record of any soldier, such soldier, or in case of his death the heirs or legal representatives of such soldier, shall receive all pay and bounty which may have been withheld on account of such charge of desertion or absence without leave: Provided, however, That this act shall not be so construed as to give to any such soldier as may be entitled to relief under the provisions of this act, or in case of his death to the heirs or legal representatives of any such soldier, the right to receive pay and bounty for any period of time during which such soldier was absent from his command without leave of absence.

SEC. 5. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. GEDDES. Mr. Chairman, I think it due for me to say that this bill to relieve soldiers from the charge of desertion is of the same general nature as a bill that passed the Committee of the Whole on a former occasion. But as a preliminary to putting the parliamentary inquiry to the Chair whether I may not press the consideration of this bill, I wish to state that it differs very materially and substantially from the former bill. This measure enlarges the rights of the soldiers, and it relieves a class which the other bill does not relieve, and a class I think quite as meritorious as any embraced and provided for in the bill which has already passed the House.

The bill already passed by us is still pending in the Senate. Objections are made to the terms and provisions of that bill; and it is my hope that if this bill should be passed and sent to the Senate, that body will be able to formulate from the two measures a bill which will do justice to all these men.

Let me state one particular in which this bill is broader and is, I think, substantially more meritorious and equitable than the bill which we passed the other day. We are aware that in many cases where a soldier left his command and was marked absent without leave the charge of desertion thus placed on the records is purely technical. Every man on this floor will recall the fact that hundreds and thousands of young men of immature age, young men in their minority, with imperfect judgments—youths of 16, 17, and 18 years, and all the way to 21 years of age—volunteered; and hundreds and thousands of these are found upon the rolls with the stigma of desertion upon their good names, upon their military history, upon their patriotic and manly conduct.

This bill provides for and meets the case of a boy 17 years of age who, with imperfect judgment, sick, prompted by impulse, or acting under the advice of his comrades, as hundreds did, returned to his home, and subsequently enlisted in another command and served bravely and gallantly and nobly to the close of the war. Not only so, but hundreds of them came back who for one reason or another had left one command, and afterward returned to their homes at the close of the war after an honorable discharge, often with one arm; and hundreds came back with but one leg; hundreds with neither eye or but one eye; thousands came back with broken constitutions, which they have carried ever since through life.

I appeal to gentlemen whether reasons do not at once occur why these might have their offenses condoned. I recollect and recall my own experience and observation. I know personally many of these boys. Some of them conceived a prejudice against the officer of their command, some of them felt they had been unkindly and severely treated by the officer of that command; yet they would not desert their country, they would not desert the flag of their country, but voluntarily sought re-entrance into the Army in other commands, and did fight faithfully and gallantly to the end of the war.

Many reasons will occur to gentlemen which prompted soldiers to leave their commands and return again to the Army by joining other commands. But, sir, I confess in all my talks with citizens and soldiers on the floor of this House I have heard but one solitary objection which in my judgment ought to be considered for a single moment against this bill, and that is, if it should pass it is claimed that this bill will embrace within its terms and provisions some men who with immature judgment, having no experience, sought it may be additional compensation to the little pittance the Government doled out to them, and some of them may have received additional bounty. I appreciate the force of that argument, and while giving it its full force and effect let us remember, let it be borne in mind, that if they committed this fault suggested, and fault it was, if they were never absent from their command for any of the other causes which I have mentioned, if they were really never substantially absent from the Army with a criminal intent to desert, but re-entered the service and served faithfully and gallantly, I submit to the members of this House whether that faithful and gallant service does not condone the previous offense.

If a boy served one year under a captain or other officer who did him injustice, and absented himself from that command and afterward entered another command, even though he got another bounty, and thereupon bravely persisted in the service of his country to the close of the war, showing firm and unwavering patriotism, showing that he did not leave the service with any intention to desert the flag, does not that action on his part condone and forever wipe out whatever previous offense he may have committed? He may have left the Army to see his old mother after three long years of sacrifice and suffering. It may be the soldier may have returned for one hour's talk with the wife of his bosom whom he had left at home when he entered the military service of his country. If he again left the endearments of family fireside and returned to the service, and faithfully discharged his duty to the country, I feel his offense should be considered condoned.

I ask for the reading of the letter of the Secretary of War favoring this enlargement of the bill.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, January 14, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 12th instant, inclosing a copy of a bill (H. R. 319) to more effectually accomplish the object of an act entitled "An act to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion," approved August 7, 1882, and asking that I should give my views.

In reply I have the honor to state that the proposed bill would, in my opinion, take away the obstacles to carrying out the provisions of sections 1 and 2 of the act to which it is an amendment, my views on this subject being quite fully expressed in a communication addressed by me to the House of Representatives on the 15th of December, 1882, a copy of which is herewith inclosed.

I take the liberty of suggesting to you that there is another class of desertion cases which seems to me to be equally meritorious with those mentioned in the bill, but for which no provision is made by the bill. There have been presented to me many applications for removal of the charge of desertion standing against the record of soldiers who left the regiment in which they had enlisted without the intention of returning thereto, and subsequently enlisted in some other regiment, their record of service in the latter regiment being without fault. Under laws then and now existing they are held as deserters from their first enlistment, and the fact of subsequent good service in another regiment does not authorize the removal of the charge of desertion from the regiment in which they had first enlisted. Many such cases have been presented to me in which, if the removal of the charges of desertion was legal as an act of clemency, any original fault having been atoned for by subsequent good service, or if the charge could be removed for the reason that the subsequent history of the soldier showed that his action was not caused by desire to avoid military service in general, or an abandonment of the service of the United States, I would have removed the charge.

I would therefore suggest for the consideration of the committee, while considering the proposed amendments, the propriety of a further amendment giving to the Secretary of War, under such restrictions as may seem proper, the discretionary power to remove the charge of desertion raised against soldiers who subsequently enlisted and received an honorable discharge after faithful service in another regiment.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

Hon. GEORGE W. GEDDES,
Chairman Committee on War Claims, House of Representatives.

Mr. GEDDES. I wish to reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, this bill H. R. 3935 is substantially the same as H. R. 4383, which has already passed the House. I wish to say to the committee why I think a bill which has already passed and been in the Senate for four or five weeks is infinitely better than the one we now have before us.

The bill which passed the House only required service up to the 1st day of May, 1865, whereas this bill requires service to the 22d day of May, 1865. The former bill, which has passed the House and is now in the Senate, and has been for some days, ought to have preference over this in that it relieves soldiers of the Army of the Potomac who served until after they had fought and routed their enemy and received their surrender. I think for that reason the other bill is infinitely better than the one pending before this committee.

The next objection is to be found in lines 10 and 11 of this bill. The bill now under consideration provides as follows: That where a man left one regiment and enlisted in another, that fact shall wipe out the offense of desertion. If a soldier in the presence of the enemy deserted his comrades who were then battling for the country, all he has to do in order to relieve himself from that crime of desertion and to be brought under the provisions of this bill is to show that although he deserted his command in the presence of the enemy he afterward re-entered the Army and joined some other command.

The gentleman from Ohio talks about this relieving immature men! It relieves the most mature deserters from their commands during the war. It relieves any man who enlisted in one regiment and staid three days, then went off into another regiment, deserted that and enlisted in another, receiving each time from $500 to $1,000 for each enlistment. I saw a man myself who had made so much money in this way, by "jumping" the bounty, that he lighted his cigars with ten-dollar notes and tied his shoes with ten-dollar bills as shoe-strings. [Laughter.]

This bill lets in men of that kind. It will let in every coward and every bounty-jumper that the country furnished during the war, every scoundrel who made it his business to jump the bounty. Talk about "immature" and "tender young men!" Mr. Chairman, this is the first eulogy I ever heard delivered on this floor or elsewhere on bounty-jumpers, and it comes from my friend from Ohio who was not with us and can not appreciate the hardships of the soldiers or the ill-feelings that existed among them with reference to a man who left them, a man who deserted them in the face of the enemy perhaps, or when there was danger threatening.

Mr. GEDDES. Let me interrupt the gentleman just there. When you say that I was not with you I suppose you mean that I was not in the Army as a soldier. You do not mean to say that I was not with you in heart, in soul, in mind, in sympathy, and with all the strength of my feelings?

Mr. STEELE. No; I mean as a soldier.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Let me interrupt the gentleman for a question.

Mr. STEELE. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I wish to ask if you would object to the relief proposed to be given to that class of cases embraced in the letter of the Secretary of War?

Mr. STEELE. I am opposed to the relief of men of that class who are embraced in the term "bounty-jumpers." I am opposed to that class of persons who deserted from one regiment and enlisted in another merely to receive the bounty, or who again deserted. I am opposed to wiping out the charge of desertion against any man who left his command under such circumstances. He might have enlisted twenty times, and under the operations of this bill he would be relieved from that charge.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. But, if my friend will excuse me, I want to call his attention to a particular case. There is at this time within the Treasury Department a soldier who left an Ohio battery in the State of Kentucky and enlisted in my own regiment, and served in it as a faithful and a gallant soldier, and was disabled in battle, his arm having been shattered by a shot.

Mr. STEELE. I did not yield to the gentleman to make a speech, but to ask a question.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I do not intend to make a speech; but I ask my friend if in a case like that he would be willing to continue the charge of desertion against the man?

Mr. STEELE. If you take an interest in the man it is your business to go at the commencement of the session and introduce a bill for his relief, and not undertake to come in with a general law to relieve him which at the same time will relieve every bounty-jumper and coward in the country. I am not opposed to relieving men who are deserving of it. I am in favor of granting relief to such a man as you indicate. I favor granting relief in the cases of those men who did not desert under aggravating circumstances, and who were not bounty-jumpers who left their comrades and the Army in its time of need.

Mr. STRUBLE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEELE. Certainly.

Mr. STRUBLE. I wish to ask whether my friend from Indiana has any serious objection to relieving men who merely deserted once, and who re-enlisted and performed services under the re-enlistment and without repeating the offense?

Mr. STEELE. The man who enlisted once under the circumstances you speak of who deserted and re-enlisted might be the biggest coward in the company and deserted at the very time that he should have been shot for it if he had not run so fast to get away that they could not catch him. I should like to know under what circumstances a man deserted before I would be willing to give my assent to such a proposition.

Mr. STRUBLE. But my understanding of your objection is that it will allow bounty-jumpers to come in.

Mr. STEELE. Bounty-jumpers and cowards all to come in.

Mr. STRUBLE. The bounty-jumpers who have performed the marvelous feats to which the gentleman refers to come in and to be relieved?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. STRUBLE. Now, the gentleman will recognize the justice of the proposition that there were many men who did desert once and re-enlisted soon after——

Mr. STEELE. They were never justified in it, and Congress should not give its approval to such an act.

Mr. STRUBLE. I do not ask the gentleman to justify it, but I ask whether we could not under the circumstances, when these men subsequently served faithfully, extend relief without injustice to anybody, and in fact extend it to the manifest good of the service?

Mr. STEELE. If a man deserted once and received a bounty for re-enlisting, he should not be relieved. If there is special merit in his case let him have his interest looked after by his member here who can introduce a bill for his relief and set forth the facts in his case and the injustice, if any, that has been done him. But do not undertake to assemble the good with the bad together in one bill.

Mr. STRUBLE. Another question: Has the gentleman any objection to relieving that class of men who never received bounties on re-enlistment?

Mr. STEELE. I have objections to relieving them by a general bill; because if a man in the presence of the enemy, in danger, when the ring of battle was in his ears, wanted to get away and did not have the courage to stand up in the line with his comrades but said to himself, "There is danger here, I am going away; I will go to Canada or somewhere else;" I say such a man should not be relieved. And yet this general bill would relieve him as well as the cases to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. ROWELL. Does not the bill which the gentleman from Indiana had passed do the same thing?

Mr. STEELE. It does not.

Mr. STRUBLE. I appreciate the point the gentleman from Indiana has made. I was there as he was during the war, and I have no excuse for that class of men. But does not the gentleman know——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. STRUBLE. I desire to ask just one more question.

Mr. STEELE. I yield simply for a question.

Mr. STRUBLE. Does not the gentleman know it is a fact that many of these men who deserted their commands did not desert in battle or in the face of the enemy, but that they deserted from the camp when no danger was threatening?

Mr. STEELE. If they then voluntarily marched to their commands and were shot, their record is to be amended by the bill that has already passed the House.

Mr. RAY, of New York. How do you propose to grant relief to those who were shot?

Mr. STEELE. Their record would be amended so that their children or their children's children might look upon their record with pride.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman from Indiana inform the committee the amount of pensions that would probably be covered by this bill?

Mr. STEELE. I do not think it is in the power of the human understanding to calculate that.

Mr. HISCOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman if this bill covered those cases that occurred during the last few months of the war when it was understood the bounty-jumping was most prevalent, and all soldiers were discharged very soon after they entered the service?

Mr. STEELE. In the bill which passed the House there is the following proviso:

And provided further, That no soldier or the heirs or legal representatives of any soldier who served in the Army a period of less than six months shall be entitled to the benefits of the provisions of this act.

By the bill now under consideration, if a man enlisted on the 25th of April and received his $1,000 bounty, and concluded he wanted to go home, and enlisted again, he is relieved from the charge of desertion. If he has enlisted a dozen times in the six months prior to the close of the war and received bounty every time, this bill relieves him from the charge of desertion. A man who enlisted on the 20th of April and went away on the 1st of May ought not to be relieved. He ought to have had some service. The bill which has passed the House only proposes to give relief to soldiers who had served through the war and then after the war was over and we had got the victory rushed to the arms of their mothers or their families to enjoy the happy fruits of that victory. The bill which has passed relieves those men. This bill relieves men who staid with their mothers or their families till they got a big bounty, enlisted, and deserted again.

I hope the bill will be voted down.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. STEELE, Yes, sir.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Does the bill which passed the House some time ago relieve this class of cases; where a soldier or a nominal soldier was permitted by the officer commanding to go home and was marked as a deserter on account of absence from his command when the command might have been ordered to move, but who subsequently joined the command and remained until the close of the war?

Mr. STEELE. The bill which passed this House and is now before the Senate relieves that class of men.

Mr. LAIRD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. LAIRD. I thought the gentleman from Indiana had concluded his remarks.

Mr. STEELE. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has forty-five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. GEDDES. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD].

Mr. LAIRD. Is it now in order to propose an amendment? I desire to offer some amendments to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate is still proceeding and amendments are not in order until that is closed.

Mr. LAIRD. Then I desire to state these amendments with which I think the bill will be properly guarded, and which will bring it into conformity with the Steele bill, that is already a law so far as the action of the House is concerned. I propose to strike out the words "twenty-second," in line 10 of the first section, and insert in lieu thereof the word "first;" so that it will read:

That no such soldier who served faithfully until the expiration of his term of enlistment, or until the 1st day of May, A. D. 1865, &c.

This amendment will remove any conflict between this bill and that which has already passed the House. To guard against the abuses anticipated by the gentleman from Indiana in his remarks, I propose to add a proviso to the second section of the bill in words to this effect:

Provided, That no soldier shall be entitled to the benefit of this act against whom more than one charge of desertion shall be found to exist.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Or who has received additional bounty.

Mr. LAIRD. I have thought about that, and the Military Committee discussed that question with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] at the time his bill was before that committee; and it was found that if we attempted to restrict the operation of the act by a limitation of that kind looking to the number or character of the bounties received by a soldier who sought relief from this disability, we would involve ourselves to that extent that it would be difficult to make an intelligent act out of it. I think, therefore, this goes far enough; and I desire to call the attention of the committee to the reason why I think that with this proviso the bill is sufficiently guarded.

Mr. STEELE. Does the gentleman think that Congress should relieve the man who deserted his comrades in the face of the enemy?

Mr. LAIRD. No, sir.

Mr. STEELE. Then I ask the gentleman if his amendment will not do that?

Mr. LAIRD. I will explain why I think it will not do that. I am bound to say with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], while my experience has not been so unfortunate with bounty-jumpers as his, yet I am disposed to think that any man who turned his back upon the enemy deserves at the hand of his country only one thing, and that is not reward, except death shall be considered a reward, for that is the only reward to which he is entitled.

But the gentleman omits to note the limitation upon the evils which he apprehends from this bill; omits to note that they are provided against in the very section which he has discussed and in the sections which follow. In order that they shall be entitled to receive this benefit, they shall have served in some other regiment, into which they shall have enlisted, and shall have been honorably discharged therefrom.

I submit that my experience in the Army, which was reasonably arduous for four years, never brought me face to face with a solitary example of a man who deserted from my command, or from any command within my knowledge, and who thereafter demonstrated his cowardice or the viciousness of his act of desertion by enlisting in any other regiment and deserting therefrom. On the contrary, I have known several instances of men who I believe will be embraced in the second section of this bill who will be entitled to the relief it will give them. I am as anxious as the gentleman from Indiana can be to protect the records of the men who did gallant service from contamination by contact with men who did not perform such service. But I believe the Secretary of War has wisely called the attention of Congress to an omission in the bill of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], as he remembers that point was discussed in the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman from Nebraska yield to me for a question?

Mr. LAIRD. Certainly.

Mr. BRUMM. Rather for a suggestion. Why not in your amendment provide also that a man to receive the benefits of this bill shall not have received more than one bounty, so as to cover the question of bounties? And I will also make another suggestion to include service in the Navy. A man may have enlisted in the Army and deserted therefrom, and afterward have enlisted in the Navy and performed service.

Mr. LAIRD. That is a good suggestion.

Mr. LONG. Why not also provide that said desertion or leave shall not have occurred in the face of the enemy?

Mr. LAIRD. I am inclined to think that is a good suggestion and to accept it.

Mr. LYMAN. You can not accept that.

Mr. LONG. Why not?

Mr. LYMAN. You can not tell what "the face of the enemy" means; there is no definition of that.

Mr. LAIRD. I think upon reflection that we may get into difficulty if we adopt that suggestion. We were always in the face of the enemy; the enemy's face was tolerably long; it was four years long. [Laughter.] I think adopting that suggestion might get us into trouble. I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] covers all the difficulties, and I am inclined to accept that.

Mr. PERKINS. With the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD], I think this bill should pass. In my judgment it aims to relieve a very meritorious class, and it also aims to relieve this body from much labor. There are perhaps hundreds of private bills pending here to-day to relieve the class of persons provided for by the second section of this bill. I have bills of that character, and so have most of the members here, to relieve by special act meritorious claimants who would be provided for by the general provisions of this bill.

Mr. CUTCHEON. And who will not be reached during this Congress.

Mr. PERKINS. And, as suggested by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON], whose cases can not be reached this session. We should in some way provide by general bill for such cases. As was suggested, the Secretary of War recognizes the merits of the petitions which are filed with him or which come to this body in the form of special bills asking for relief; but under the law as it is to-day, or as it is construed by the Secretary of War, he can not relieve them.

I have a bill pending for the benefit of a young man who enlisted when he was but 18 years of age. He served for nine months under his first enlistment. Another regiment was organized at his home, and his more immediate friends and relatives went into that second organization. They prevailed upon him to join that organization, and he joined it and served for three years and twelve days in that second regiment. He was an honorable and meritorious soldier, and no charge of desertion or wrong-doing was ever made against him while serving in that second regiment.

Mr. STEELE. The Secretary of War no doubt gets appeals which are very meritorious; but he does not get applications from men who deserted in the presence of the enemy. Those men have hardly cheek enough to ask him for relief, but Congress is asked to relieve them.

Mr. PERKINS. Were those men honorably discharged?

Mr. STEELE. They were not.

Mr. PERKINS. This bill provides relief for men who were honorably discharged.

Mr. STEELE. It does not.

Mr. PERKINS. This is the language of the bill:

Such soldier charged with desertion or with absence without leave, after such charge of desertion or absence without leave, voluntarily returned to his command, or who subsequently enlisted in another regiment or company and served in the line of his duty until he was mustered out of the service, and received a certificate of honorable discharge.

I think that with the restriction suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM], and which was accepted by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD], the bill will be a good one. It will provide that if more than one charge of desertion is found to have been made against a soldier he can not then claim the benefits of this act. They must come here and ask relief by special bill.

But this bill, if the amendment suggested should be adopted, will relieve this House of much labor—will relieve us from the importunities of individual claimants who have meritorious cases. The Secretary of War will by general law be authorized in such cases to correct this adverse record, and to grant to soldiers of this class what they earned by honorable service.

It seems to me there should be no objection to such a measure. As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES], the chairman of the Committee on War Claims, has eloquently and fairly stated, these cases are in many instances just as meritorious as any that come to Congress for relief; but the relief should be granted by general law, because time does not allow us by special legislation to do justice in each particular case.

At the same time this bill should be, of course, carefully guarded against fraudulent claims by "bounty-jumpers," who enlisted only for the purpose of gain, to secure the gratuities offered by various communities. Fraudulent claims of this description will be guarded against by the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska. With that amendment I support this bill, and hope it will pass.

Mr. GEDDES. I will now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR].

Mr. STEELE. I would like to resume the floor, and yield to some gentleman who is to speak in opposition to the bill. I desire to yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. J. D. TAYLOR].

Mr. HORR. I will wait till the gentleman from Ohio has spoken.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, it is very important that this bill, or any bill which may be passed on this subject, should be carefully guarded so as to exclude men who were well known during the war as "bounty-jumpers." I had occasion at one time to investigate the process that was going on in a certain camp. I learned in this way that there were large numbers of men whose sole business was to enlist as soldiers, receive the large bounties which were then being paid, go into camp, put on the United States uniform, deposit with their officers a part of the bounty, obtain leave of absence on the pretense of going home to see their friends prior to entering upon military service; and then they would never return to do duty under their enlistment. They would immediately re-enlist, receive another bounty, go into camp again—sometimes even into the same camp—again deposit a part of their bounty and leave, never to fulfill the terms of their enlistment. This was a regular business with these professional "bounty-jumpers."

An officer who was connected with the particular camp where I made my investigation had at one time deposited with a single party $40,000, which had been left in his hands by these professional "bounty-jumpers."

Thus I had occasion to learn that there were hundreds and hundreds of these men who after enlisting never went into the Army, never heard the firing of a gun, never were in the presence of the enemy, and never intended to fight, who only wore the country's uniform as a means of deception and fraud. Thousands of such men during the war received large sums of money without rendering any military service. They went from one camp to another, from one city to another; they enlisted in one regiment after another. I do hope, Mr. Chairman, that we shall not open the vaults of the Treasury to this large horde of men whose only business during the war was to "jump the bounty" and to obtain money for which they never rendered service.

Mr. GEDDES. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR].

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, it is with a great deal of diffidence that I undertake to give an opinion in this case after the intimation of my friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] that it is not exactly modest for us men who were not at the front during the war to have an opinion on a question of this kind.

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman will permit me to ask, in what way did I intimate that?

Mr. HORR. If I remember the gentleman's speech aright, he called the gentleman from Ohio to account for having an opinion on this subject when he was not at the front, and did not know how to sympathize with men who were there. Am I mistaken in that?

Mr. STEELE. I suggested that the gentleman from Ohio could not appreciate how we who were at the front felt when men deserted while we were fighting our battles.

Mr. HORR. I presume, Mr. Chairman, that is true. Since I have been a member of this House, I have listened a good many times to very humiliating remarks made in that way by men who were in the military service—throwing up to me the fact that I was not. Now, I feel badly enough about it without being twitted with it all the time. [Laughter.] And I have a sort of suspicion that it is not a real badge of gallantry for any soldier to be always "blowing" about having been "at the front." I am willing to admit that my friend from Indiana carries half a ton of lead, if you please, in his body. I am not particular about a few pounds. [Laughter.] But I do insist that we men who were at home may have upon a matter of this kind a sort of judgment which we are a little tender about, and which we feel we have a right to express in this House.

Now, I have in my mind a soldier who would be covered by this very bill. I have made repeated attempts at the War Department to get him relieved from the charge of desertion under which he unjustly rests. He is carrying to-day perhaps not so many bullets in him as my friend from Indiana, but he has two large rebel bullets in his body. Though I have done all I possibly could, I have been unable to get that man relieved from this unjust charge. This bill will do it.

Mr. STEELE. I should like the gentleman from Michigan to state whether he was shot in the front or back of his body.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, I have more sympathy for a soldier who was shot in the back than for one who was not hit at all. [Laughter and applause.] You can not always tell about these matters. I have been told by men who were shot in the back that it was done while they were in the discharge of their duties. I understand that an officer who is leading his men is more liable to be hit in the rear than in front.

Mr. STEELE. I wish to see the record.

Mr. HORR. He was marked as a deserter when he went home, but finally enlisted in another branch of the service and fought two years and a half afterward. Why, the War Department, every time I go to them, tell me there is no power to reach this man's case.

I do not believe there is much more danger than there ought to be in relieving this man. We are living to-day in a sort of atmosphere of forgiveness. [Laughter and applause.] Why certainly there are very many men in the United States who did not desert but who did shoot at us fellows. [Laughter.] Not at us, but let me say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] at you fellows. [Laughter and applause.] Well, we have forgiven them. We have taken them into our embraces. They have taken us, my friend says, into their embraces. [Renewed laughter.]

Now, I say here that a man, although he may have left the ranks, who afterward went back and did his duty as a soldier, is entitled to fair treatment and consideration, such as he can not get here by a private bill.

I have had some experience in private bills in this House. You can not get one through. My friend tells me he has passed five or six of them this session. There is something about a man who is on a committee in reference to these things that gives him a big advantage. [Laughter and applause.] Of course I do not complain of it. Well, my bill goes to that committee. I am busy. I finally work down and present it, and the man who has it in charge reports it, possibly, and after a while I get it on the Calendar. But there, Mr. Chairman, it sleeps the sleep of death. [Laughter.] You can no more resurrect it. It is beyond resurrection from that hour. Now, this bill gives you your resurrection in advance.

I ask my friend, as a soldier, as a man who did his duty, as we all admit he did, because you happen to have been fortunate and staid with your command [laughter], is it not possible there may be cases where men left their commands for a little while, but finally plucked up courage, went into the Army, and did their duty afterward?

They did then even more than I ever did, and am glad myself for their having been so valiant. I mean, I feel grateful to them, not for deserting, but for what they did after they deserted, when they went back. I am, Mr. Chairman, in favor of this bill and hope it will pass.

Mr. STEELE. Before yielding the floor, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that in reference to the statement made by the gentleman from Michigan, I refer in no way to any bills I myself had introduced. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will say I have not asked to have any bill referred to me. They were not, therefore, bills personal to myself, not one.

The only objection I have to this bill is the one I have already stated, and it is vital to its passage. The only objection I have to what the gentleman from Michigan has said is he ought to have eulogized or commended the soldiers who died on the field of battle instead of eulogizing bounty-jumpers.

I yield now for twenty minutes to my colleague [Mr. BROWNE].

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, there is no question but that there are those who are entitled to the relief given by this bill. There are those who after having served in one command deserted in a technical sense and joined another, and who performed faithful service until the end of the war and then received an honorable discharge. My colleague [Mr. STEELE] does not object to giving relief to men of that class; no gentleman here objects to it; no soldier objects to it. But this bill, without any kind of qualification, gives an honorable discharge to every one who having deserted subsequently joined another command and from that second service received an honorable discharge.

I do not know whether I will be subject to censure from the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] if I should intimate that I happened to be in the service for a short time, but if there is anybody in the world for whom I have sympathy it is a coward; not the one who staid out of the service, but the one who staid in it. I think I know how a coward feels under fire [laughter], and I was never so happy in my life as I was not long since in reading some discussion on physiology, where it is claimed that courage is only a little more or a little less of arterial circulation, and a fellow who has lots of blood in his arteries is brave and the man who has it imperfectly is a coward. I can not see why it is that the gentleman from Michigan should be blamed for having a little less blood in his arteries than others. Courage and cowardice are merely questions of arterial circulation.

Now, coming back to the question, a very large majority of those who deserted under the circumstances stated and who rejoined some other commands, did it for one of two reasons: either to secure the increased bounty that was offered by the later acts of Congress, or to enable them to accept employment as a substitute and get a large sum for entering the Army in that capacity. It will be remembered, of course, that the earlier troops in the war received no bounty whatever, and I believe the first three years' troops only received a bounty of $100. After a while the Government gave bounties as large as $300.

In addition to this Government bounty, counties, cities, and even townships were offering local bounties, that their quota of troops might be made up and their respective communities relieved from the operation of the draft; and I assert here that a large proportion of those who deserted and subsequently went into the service the second time deserted in order that they might receive this increased bounty. I know that from what I know of desertions from my own command and from others in the service, and I state what I believe to be a fact, a fact which will be fully demonstrated if the War Department is ever called upon to make an investigation into the circumstances under which those persons who are to be relieved by this bill deserted the first time.

I am in favor of the bill if you can make it apply in its terms to those simply who had become offended with their superior officers or believed that they had been badly treated, those who conceived some offense of that character but still intended to continue in the fight, those who had no purpose of jumping the bounty or deserting to receive increased bounty, and where the purpose to desert was not conceived in order to go as a substitute for some other persons able and willing to pay a large sum. If you include these only I will cheerfully vote for the relief proposed to be given here. But I say to you now that I shall never vote for this bill in its present shape. I shall not vote for it until I am ready to put the man upon the pension-roll "who broke his leg attempting to jump a bounty."

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Do you not think that the discretion vested in the Secretary of War under the provisions of the second section of the bill is sufficient to exclude the class of cases you mention?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not know. That depends very much upon the manner in which that discretion is exercised; but I believe it to be vicious in legislation to give any officer the discretion to do a wrong thing. I do not believe in leaving the doing of an improper thing in the discretion of any person. But my friend from Massachusetts sitting near me [Mr. LYMAN] has had his attention called to the section in question, and says that there is not much room for discretion in the section to which my friend referred.

Now, with all due deference to my friend who urges the passage of this bill, I suggest that it would be better if it should be withdrawn for the present and so framed as that its benefits shall go to such persons as are entitled to it. I have attempted to give some reasons why I think the bill ought not to pass. I have no doubt that the gentleman from Ohio expected its provisions to operate solely on those who ought to have the relief that the bill contemplates. But I think after the statements that have been made he will see that this relief may go to some who least of all others deserve it—that is, those who deserted for the purpose of making money by it.

I have, Mr. Chairman, some kind of respect, or at least I have some sympathy, for the man who deserted in the face of the enemy because he had not nerve or the courage to stand up to be shot at. I can have some kind of respect for him; but for the mercenary soldier who deserts his command simply to procure more money as a bounty or by going into the service for some one as a substitute I have no respect, and I am not willing to vote him any relief.

Mr. GEDDES. Mr. Chairman, I have consented to yield much of my time to other members of the committee, but I would be glad to move now that the committee rise and report the bill favorably to the House, unless I see manifested a disposition to further discuss it. It has been stated to me by members that they would like to discuss it briefly. If so, I will not make the motion.

Mr. ROWELL. I would like to be recognized for a short time on this question.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio, the gentleman from Illinois, and the gentleman from Indiana that the bill be laid aside until our next meeting, as there is a measure here that will produce no discussion, and it is important that it shall be acted upon, in order that the Senate may have jurisdiction of the question, which they are bound to act upon some time during the session. If the gentleman will yield I will make a motion to that effect.

Mr ROWELL. If I can be recognized now I shall not have any objection.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to be recognized to speak on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman in charge of the bill, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES].

Mr. GEDDES. I have said to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] that I will not antagonize the object he has in view.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not think the measure I speak of will produce any discussion. It is on this Calendar, and is for the relief of private individuals. If it does not, then we shall have time probably to dispose of this and other measures too. I refer to the bill embracing what are known as the 4th-of-July claims, claims that have been reported favorably by the accounting officers and are pro forma referred to Congress for appropriations to meet them. There is no controversy over a single claim in the bill. It was reported from the Committee on War Claims by the chairman of that committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES]. I think there will be no difficulty in passing it, and then we will probably have time to dispose of this one also.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I must object to that. That bill must be proceeded with in its regular order.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to do so, he can probably defeat its consideration.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I have been waiting here the whole day to have a bill considered which stands next on the Calendar, and I do not see why I should yield to anybody else. I believe I have rights here as well as other gentlemen.

Mr. McMILLIN. And I would be the last to attempt to infringe the rights of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that the pending bill be passed over for one week. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ROWELL. I now call up the bill (H. R. 5377) on page 33 of the Calendar, a bill for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I insist on the consideration of the next bill on the Calendar being proceeded with.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Illinois to state his proposition.

Mr. ROWELL. My proposition is to take up the bill (H. R. 5377) referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] covering the 4th-of-July claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take up out of its order the bill (H. R. 5377) for present consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I object to anything being considered out of the regular order.

Mr. ROWELL. I think the gentleman would not insist on his objection if he would hear me for a moment. There are several hundreds of parties interested in this bill. It is the customary bill passed every session. There are some amendments to it for the correction of mere clerical errors.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. The time the gentleman consumes in his explanation would pass the next bill on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Calendar.

BENJAMIN F. MILLARD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3936) for the relief of Benjamin F. Millard.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Benjamin F. Millard, late a first lieutenant in the Second Regiment Louisiana Cavalry, United States Volunteers, the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant of cavalry from the 1st day of January, 1864, to the 17th day of March, 1864.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2604) for the relief of Benjamin F. Millard, submit the following report:

That the claimant asks compensation for services alleged to have been rendered as second lieutenant of the Second Regiment Louisiana Cavalry, from January 1, 1864, to March 17, 1864.

The commission of Benjamin F. Millard, filed as evidence before the committee, bears date December 31, 1863. The certificate of the mustering officer shows that claimant was not mustered as second lieutenant until March 17, 1864. It appears from the sworn statements of the officers of the company and regiment of which Millard was a second lieutenant, and other reliable witnesses, that claimant did actually serve in the capacity and discharged the duties of second lieutenant of Company E, Second Regiment Louisiana Cavalry, from January 1, 1864, to March 17, 1864.

It appears from proof obtained from the War Department that claimant was paid from the date of muster, and not from the date of his commission.

Your committee, in view of the foregoing facts, report back to the House a substitute for the bill, and recommend its passage.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. The facts of the case are all embraced in the report which has been read. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ROWELL. I now renew my request. The next bill on the Calendar is one which will excite a good deal of discussion. I think it can not be disposed of in less than one or two hours. I ask that the Committee proceed to consider the bill (H. R. 5377) covering the 4th-of-July claims.

Mr. COSGROVE. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Calendar.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3937) for the relief of Willis N. Arnold.

The bill was read.

The Clerk commenced to read the report.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee. I ask that this bill be passed over informally for the present, not to lose its place on the Calendar.

Mr. GEDDES. Having consented to pass over the bill in the consideration of which the committee was engaged a short time ago, I could not consistently now insist that we should proceed with the consideration of this bill. I know that it will elicit earnest discussion and occupy considerable time; therefore I yield very cheerfully to the desire of the gentleman from Tennessee that it may be informally passed over with the other bill that we have been considering.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the bill will be passed over informally.

There was no objection.

The next business on the Private Calendar was an adverse report on the bill (H. R. 1477) to pay Hiram Johnson and other persons therein named the several sums of money therein specified, being the surplus of a military assessment paid by them and accounted for to the United States in excess of the amount required for the indemnity for which it was levied and collected.

Mr. GEDDES. This is an adverse report, which should properly be considered in connection with the preceding bill on the Calendar. I ask that it also be passed over informally.

There was no objection.

J. H. HAMMOND.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1327) for the relief of J. H. Hammond.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to J. H. Hammond, of Philadelphia, Pa., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,000, in full for the loss of the barge William T. Anderson while in the military service of the United States by charter, as fully appears by papers now on file in the office of the Third Auditor of the Treasury.

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on War Claims, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 1327:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1327) for the relief of J. H. Hammond, submit the following report, as one made in the Forty-seventh Congress, which report they adopt:

[House Report No. 2029, Forty-seventh Congress, second session.]

That this claim is for the value of the barge William T. Anderson, alleged to have been lost while in the service of the United States during the late war. Claim stated at $2,000.

It appears from the proof submitted that the barge when lost was in the military service of the United States, under a charter-party which contained a stipulation as follows:

"The war risk will be borne by the United States; the marine risk by the owners until under orders south of Cape Henry (the southern cape of Chesapeake Bay), after which the marine risk will be borne by the United States until they reach that latitude on their return."

The evidence shows that the loss of the barge was near the mouth of the Potomac River, in the Chesapeake Bay, north of Cape Henry, and was occasioned by a marine risk.

The claimant submits statements of Hon. John Tucker and Capt. H. C. Hodges, the former at one time Assistant Secretary of War, and the latter the officer who executed the charter under which the barge entered the military service, to the effect that the understanding was that the Government would assume both the war and marine risks upon vessels which should be chartered for the McClellan expedition; and that Captain Hodges, while intending so to stipulate on behalf of the Government, neglected to erase from the form of charter used the words which bound the owners to assume the marine risk until under orders south of Cape Henry; and that consequently the charter does not express the true intent of the contracting parties.

This claim was filed in the Treasury Department on the 3d day of April, 1864, and on the 16th day of September, 1864, disallowed, for the following reasons, given by the Third Auditor, to wit:

"The accounting officers have no equity jurisdiction, and consequently no power to correct mistakes in or alter the terms of charters, and none to receive evidence which contradicts the provisions thereof."

It clearly appears by the evidence of the Government's own officers how it happened that the printed words in the blank charter were not struck out, as the Government assumed both the war and marine risks in all cases of vessels chartered for the McClellan expedition.

The rejection of this claim by the Third Auditor is based upon a mere technicality, unworthy of a great Government in its dealings with its loyal citizens.

The evidence filed in this case (all original) from the files of the Department shows the value of the barge at the sum claimed, namely, $2,000, and was given at the time when the matter was fresh in the minds of all the parties.

Your committee therefore reports back the bill, and recommends that it do pass.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I think the report sufficiently explains the facts, and unless some one has some questions to ask or suggestions to make, I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill has been before the House on former occasions, and I wish to call the attention of my friend from Wisconsin to my understanding of the case. The Government in some other cases in connection with the same expedition assumed as well the marine as the war risks, but in the contract touching this vessel did not assume the marine risks covering the point where the vessel was lost. Now, this case has been considered in former Congresses long prior to the Forty-seventh, and it then appeared in the form in which I now present it; that is to say, that the Government did make certain contracts with other vessels different from the contract in this case; but because the Government made contracts which covered marine as well as war risks in other instances, that is no reason why the contract with these parties should be modified to conform to the others.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. That is very true. But the evidence of the Assistant Secretary of War and of another officer of the Government shows very clearly that this was a mistake; that it was the intention of those officers in making this contract that these words should be stricken out, but by pure inadvertence they were not stricken out. The Government used blank forms of contract similar to those used in other cases, and inadvertently the officers omitted to make the erasure in the contract.

It raises precisely this question: If in the case of any two private individuals there was a mistake in the language of a contract; in other words, if the written or printed form of contract did not conform to the actual fact, if it did not set forth the real contract between the parties, any court of equity would correct the contract. It is a matter of every-day occurrence in courts of justice. In this case the party can not sue the Government. The Department before which his claim was long ago presented decided that it had no equity jurisdiction, and that it must reject the claim simply on the ground that whatever may have been the actual contract, the written contract between this party and the Government did not justify its allowance.

There is no dispute in regard to the facts; on the contrary, it is clearly proven that it was the intention between this man and the Government that the Government should assume this risk. By reason of a mistake the contract failed to state that the Government assumed this risk. The question is, will Congress correct that mistake?

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall ask my friend to have read the two statements referred to by him. I wish to inquire, however, whether the statement of those two officers were official statements, or were they affidavits made by them after they had gone out of office? How is that?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. As I understand, they were made after they went out of office.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend will bear in mind that if this bill had been sent to the Quartermaster's Department, where this claim originated, and had gone from there to the Third Auditor's Office, the whole facts could have been ascertained. You could have ascertained whether these officers were authorized to enter into contracts broader than the printed blanks, which indicated the risks the Government was to assume, both the war risks and the marine risks. The Quartermaster-General could have informed the committee without any trouble to what extent the subordinate officers of the Government were authorized to vary the printed forms of contract.

Those printed forms contained the provisions in the behalf of the Government. The question is whether this particular provision should have been stricken out or not. The Quartermaster's Department without any difficulty could have furnished information as to whether there was any authority on the part of these subordinate officers to strike out that provision.

If the Quartermaster's Department will certify that it was intended to make this contract with that provision modified in conformity with the terms of this report, then the case would be a very clear one. Had such been the case this bill would have passed long ago.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I assume that we know just as well as does the Quartermaster-General what was the authority of the Assistant Secretary of War. The Assistant Secretary of War undoubtedly had, in time of great emergency, when it was necessary to suddenly send vessels to the South, authority to charter such vessels. And beyond all question, if it was necessary that the Government should assume greater risks than it had been in the habit of assuming, he had the right to make such a contract as was necessary to supply vessels for the emergency. That was all that occurred in this instance.

Prior to this time the contracts had all been of one character. They were printed contracts, and by them the Government assumed only a portion of the risk. But for the McClellan expedition, one which it was necessary to send off suddenly, it was found that vessels could not be obtained without making a special agreement. Those special agreements were made, and there can be no possible doubt but that the Secretary of War, or the Assistant Secretary of War acting in his behalf, had power to make such special agreements. Otherwise the military service would have been sadly crippled, and the Government with all its property would have been at the mercy of the enemy.

It must be borne in mind that there is no controversy whatever but that in this case there was a mistake pure and simple; there is no testimony controverting that statement. It resolves itself, therefore, into this question, whether this Congress will exercise the powers of a court of equity and allow this contract to be corrected so that it will conform to the real facts. If a private individual should refuse to correct a contract in which there was a clerical mistake proved beyond all question, he would properly be called a dishonest man. It would be an act of dishonesty which the courts would take the first opportunity to correct. This great Government can scarcely afford to be less honest in its dealings than any private citizen would be compelled to be. If this claimant could have sued the Government he would have had relief years ago——

Mr. HOLMAN. If, as a legal proposition, it is clear that it was intended that this contract should be different from what it really was, then I would go very cheerfully with my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. JONES] to have the correction made.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Has the gentleman read the statement of the Assistant Secretary of War?

Mr. HOLMAN. No; I have not read it of late years; this was an early claim. I will ask my friend to have that paper read.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. If it is here I shall very glad to have it read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume it is among the papers filed in support of the claim.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will send the paper to the desk it will be read.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I suppose it is in the file-room; I will send for it.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the important paper in the claim, and it seems to me it ought to have been set forth in the report. This whole case turns upon the authority which the Secretary of War may have given to modify the terms of the contract or to modify the printed form used in the chartering of vessels. The reason the Government did not assume the marine risk to the same extent as the war risk was that the owner of the vessel could insure against the marine risk. I do not remember—does my friend from Wisconsin remember?—whether there was an insurance of this vessel.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I do not think that appears in the papers. Allow me to correct the gentleman by saying that in this case the Secretary of War never changed or modified any contract. Those printed blanks were not contracts until they were signed by the parties. In this case the contract, when signed by the parties, did not, owing to the mistake which has been explained, express the real agreement between them; a circumstance which very often happens in the dealings of one man with another.

Mr. STORM. There is no question, Mr. Chairman, that if this case were before a court of equity the contract would be reformed in such a way as to do equity between the parties. The Government, having occasion to employ a number of vessels in an extrahazardous business, was obliged in order to obtain them to take all risks—war risks as well as marine risks.

In this particular case, by accident, as is admitted on both sides, the agreement as signed by the parties was different from those under which all the other vessels were employed. Now, if this case were in a court of equity, the court, upon such a state of facts, would beyond all question order the contract to be reformed, so that neither party should get the benefit of words which were through mistake made a part of the contract.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not my friend think it a little hazardous in a matter like this and where the facts occurred so long ago to act upon ex parte affidavits? I admit that where the correction could be made officially and in the entire absence of any motive to misrepresent the facts, it might be safe enough to proceed in this way. But after the loss has occurred, to allow an officer of the Government to say that he was authorized to modify the printed form, but by mistake did not do so, is rather perilous. I should prefer to see a case like this go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. STORM. If I knew how the Quartermaster's Department or a committee of Congress could get testimony in a case of this kind otherwise than by ex parte affidavits I would agree with the gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Court of Claims could do so easily.

Mr. ROWELL. This affidavit is dated in 1865. The question is simply whether the United States Government, because it has the power, will refuse to do what a court of equity in a case coming before it would compel anybody to do. To refuse the payment of this claim is not economy, it is simply repudiation.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I now have the affidavit, and I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

John Tucker, being duly sworn, according to law, doth depose and say, that he was Assistant Secretary of War under the Government of the United States in March, 1862; that when the transports for the McClellan expedition were chartered at that time, the owners of canal-boats had refused to take the marine risk, especially as the Secretary of War had advertised that the War Department would take the marine risk as well as the war risk, and that their bids were made on that condition. A very large number were immediately required. Deponent directed Captain H. C. Hodges, assistant quartermaster, to fill up the charter-parties with that condition. About January, 1863, deponent learned that in some of them he (Hodges) had omitted to make the requisite alterations on the printed blanks. Deponent knew of no exception to the general rule he had established. Deponent addressed said Hodges on the subject, and a reply was received to the effect that the Government assumed the marine risk, notwithstanding the words in the charter-party to the contrary.

JOHN TUCKER.

Sworn and subscribed before me this 14th day of December, A. D., 1865.

E. H. BAILEY,
Notary Public.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

SANTIAGO DE LEON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1724) for the relief of Santiago de Leon.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $2,988 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid to Santiago de Leon, of Victoria, Tex., in full compensation for certain mules, horses, and wagon-harness belonging to and taken from him, for the use of the Government, at Brownsville, Tex., on or about the 31st day of May, 1865.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1724) for the relief of Santiago de Leon, submit the following report:

The facts out of which this claim for relief arises will be found stated in House report of the Committee on War Claims No. 1387, second session Forty-sixth Congress, a copy of which is hereto appended.

Your committee adopt the said report as their own, and report back the bill and recommend its passage.

[House Report No. 1387, Forty-sixth Congress, second session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom the bill (H. R. 2307) for the relief of Santiago de Leon, of Victoria County, Texas, was referred, submit the following report:

The facts in this case, as established by the evidence, are substantially as follows:

Santiago de Leon was a citizen of Victoria County, in the State of Texas. On May 31, 1865, he owned and had in his possession at Brownsville, Cameron County, Texas, three wagons, twenty-eight mules, two horses, and twenty-eight sets of wagon-harness, used by him in his business of teaming, by which he supported himself and family, and on that day said property was seized and taken from him by Capt. F. E. Lombar, as acting United States quartermaster, for the use of the Federal Army. June 9, 1865, De Leon addressed a letter to Brig. Gen. E. B. Brown, then commanding at Brownsville, relative to the seizure of his property, which letter was by General Brown referred to Major Hudson for an investigation of the claim. Major Hudson, after an investigation, reported to General Brown, and recommended payment by the Quartermaster's Department. Very soon thereafter the quartermaster returned to De Leon three wagons and twelve sets of harness.

October 9, 1865, De Leon's brother and agent addressed another letter to Maj. Gen. F. Steele, then commanding at Brownsville, who referred the matter to Maj. O. O. Potter, chief quartermaster western district of Texas, who recommended the payment of the claim, and directed the quartermaster to give vouchers therefor.

December 14, 1865, General Weitzel, having succeeded General Sickles, indorsed the claim, and directed General Wright, at Galveston, to have the same paid in full.

Copies of the correspondence, indorsements, and orders relative to the claim are made a part of this report as an appendix thereto.

The claim is for—

| 28 work-mules, at $90 | $2,520 00 |
| 2 large work-horses | 180 00 |
| 16 sets wagon-harness | 288 00 |
| Total | 2,988 00 |

The fact that the property was appropriated to the use of the Federal Army is fully established, as is also the value thereof, as claimed. Generals Browne, Steele, and Weitzel seem to have been convinced of De Leon's loyalty, or they would not severally have recommended and urged the payment of this claim. Besides this, there is other and ample proof of the fact of loyalty.

It seems to have been the intention of the Government, as expressed by the officers above mentioned, to pay De Leon for this property taken, but in consequence of the change of officers, or some negligence or inadvertence on the part of the quartermaster, or other reason not fully explained, payment was not secured.

De Leon seems to have been guilty of no neglect in presenting and prosecuting his claim. After the act of July 4, 1864, the Quartermaster's Department had not jurisdiction of it, and until the creation of the Commissioners of Claims by the act of March 3, 1871, the claimant could only resort to Congress.

A bill was introduced for his relief in May, 1870, and referred to the Committee on Claims, who never reported thereon. In each subsequent Congress a bill was introduced and referred, but seems never to have been reached and reported, until in the Forty-fifth Congress the Committee on War Claims reported in favor of the allowance of the claim. The bill reported by them was placed upon the Calendar, but never reached. The report of that committee is referred to.

It seems to the committee that upon the facts stated this claim should be allowed, and they recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

APPENDIX.

[Letter of June 9, 1865, from De Leon to General Brown.]

* * * I therefore beg of you to have my property returned, or, if the Government should need the aforesaid property, to order payment of the same, as this is all I possess to make an honest living for my family.

Thereon are the following indorsements:

HEADQUARTERS UNITED STATES FORCES,
Brownsville, Tex., June 10, 1865.

Respectfully referred to Major Hudson for investigation and report.
By order of E. B. Brown, brigadier-general commanding.

J. B. RUST,
Acting Assistant Adjutant-General.

OFFICE ABANDONED PROPERTY, Brownsville, Tex., June 17, 1865.

Respectfully returned. The evidence produced by Mr. De Leon proves the within property (28 mules and 2 horses) to have been his property as claimed, and that it passed into the possession of the Quartermaster's Department.

The claimant has been engaged in hauling cotton; a portion of the time he states he was compelled to work in confederate government employ. He is a citizen of the United States.

I recommend that Quartermaster's Department be directed to pay for the within property.

J. K. HUDSON,
Major, Sixty-second United States Colored Troops,
In charge abandoned property.

Whereupon on same day, viz, June 17, 1865, General Brown instructed Captain Lombar to give claimant vouchers for his property or return it; neither of which was done.

On December 14, 1865, Maj. Gen. G. Weitzel, having succeeded General Steele in the command of the District of the Rio Grande, in referring to the papers in the case, certified as follows:

"These papers were turned over to me by Maj. Gen. F. Steele, on the day of his departure. General Steele and myself were both fully of the opinion that these animals should be paid for in full, and I would again recommend that it be done."

And on same day he inclosed to General Wright, at Galveston, said certificate in an official communication, of which the following is a copy:

BROWNSVILLE, TEX., December 14, 1865.

GENERAL: The bearer is Patricio de Leon, brother of Santiago de Leon, the claimant for twenty-eight mules and two horses unjustly and illegally taken from him by General Brown's troops. He ought to be paid in full. Mr. Patricio de Leon is acting with full power of attorney for his brother. I wish you would designate some way in which the matter can be settled.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

G. WEITZEL,
Major-General, Commanding.

Maj. Gen. H. G. WRIGHT,
Commanding Department of Texas, Galveston, Tex.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the Clerk to read the latter communication again, and I ask the attention of the House to it.

The Clerk read as follows:

BROWNSVILLE, TEX., December 14, 1865.

GENERAL: The bearer is Patricio de Leon, brother of Santiago de Leon, the claimant for twenty-eight mules and two horses unjustly and illegally taken from him by General Brown's troops. He ought to be paid in full. Mr. Patricio de Leon is acting with full power of attorney for his brother. I wish you would designate some way in which the matter can be settled.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

G. WEITZEL,
Major-General, Commanding.

Maj. Gen. H. G. WRIGHT,
Commanding Department of Texas, Galveston, Tex.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course there was no jurisdiction by the Quartermaster's Department under the act of 1864 to adjust this claim, but the Southern Claims Commission, which was authorized in 1871 and which expired in 1881, had jurisdiction over it. And there seems to be no explanation whatever why this claim did not go before this commission instead of coming to Congress, where the case had to be heard on ex parte testimony. Had this party gone before the Southern Claims Commission ample opportunity would have been afforded for fair investigation and the hearing of testimony on both sides. For the purpose of facilitating the examination of these claims the Government authorized the Southern Claims Commission to send out commissioners where worthy claims existed, with full power to take testimony, so as to make the cost of the proceedings as light as possible. I think my friend from Wisconsin will regard it as a point against this claim that it was not submitted to that tribunal, which had complete jurisdiction of it, with ample power to do full justice to the claimant.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Indiana is mistaken in his statement of fact. This claimant presented his claim to Congress before the organization of the Southern Claims Commission.

Mr. HOLMAN. The report does not speak of that. The Southern Claims Commission was in existence from 1871 to 1881, and I would like to know why this claim was never presented to that tribunal which was amply competent to furnish relief.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. It does appear in the report that before the organization of the Southern Claims Commission, to which the gentleman from Indiana has referred, this claimant had duly and seasonably filed his claim before the Congress of the United States. He had submitted it to the only court which at that time had jurisdiction of it. If he had chosen, it is true he might possibly have withdrawn his claim from Congress and presented it to the Southern Claims Commission.

Mr. HOLMAN. That was what was generally done.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I do not know about that. It appears from the report of the committee in this case that this man, about whose loyalty there is no sort of doubt or question, presented his claim at the first opportunity to Congress, and from that day to this has been vainly asking for its payment. The generals in command regarded it as a just claim. Every general in command alleged it to be a just claim. There were several changes in commanding officers, one following another in quick succession, and every one recommended the claim and certified to the loyalty of the claimant.

Mr. HOLMAN. But no vouchers were given.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. No vouchers were given.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course if vouchers had been given it would have been paid.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. On account of that bare technicality I do not think Congress should be estopped from considering this honest claim.

It is not a claim which arose out of the taking of supplies on the ground of military necessity. It was incurred in the summer of 1865, when the war practically had ceased. The claimant at once presented his claim to the commanding officers. As I have stated, there were several changes in the command, and this may account in part for the fact that he failed to obtain payment of those in command of the Army. A change was made soon after this property was taken, and those succeeding to the command may not have had the same sense of responsibility that they would if personally cognizant of the facts. Yet each one recommended its payment.

If he had withdrawn his claim after Congress had gained jurisdiction and filed it before the Southern Claims Commission it would perhaps have been met there with the objection he ought to have prosecuted his claim in the forum he had first selected. He presented it to Congress, and ever since has been urging Congress to pass on it. It seems to us only fair that the bill should after these long delays receive favorable action.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend will remember that a tribunal was organized for the express purpose of relieving Congress in the examination of these claims. These claims, of course, came in vast numbers between 1865 and 1870, and this tribunal, consisting of three judges, was organized, with ample power to take testimony for the purpose of relieving Congress, and also to give to the loyal people in the States to which its operations were confined a court of ample and complete jurisdiction for the presentation of their claims. It examined claims running up in the aggregate to over $60,000,000.

Now, my friend speaks of the giving of a voucher as a mere technicality. It may be technical, as a matter of course, but if there had been a voucher given, as it would have been given if this matter had been proper upon its face, that would have been a sufficient and satisfactory evidence to warrant its payment. The committee would not have found it a technical evidence in support of it, but a means of compelling payment, and of course the voucher would have been given had there been no ground for objection. I am a little apprehensive that the statement read there may have had something to do with the matter.

It has been said by some person, by the claimant himself, that he was forced into the service of the confederate government. I have heard no explanation of that at all. I do not myself accept it as expressing the sentiment of the law, but I apprehend that that is the real point of difficulty and the reason the voucher was not issued. I must take it as at least probable that the fact mentioned by my friend from Wisconsin did not appear as clearly as he thinks it did, that is to say, that the loyalty of the claimant was established beyond a doubt. A statement from the Quartermaster's Department showing the reason the claim was not adjusted and an explanation on the other hand why it was not presented to the Court of Claims would make it much more satisfactory.

And I may be permitted to say that it is walking on dangerous ground indeed, though it be in a small way; it is like treading on a mass of burning plowshares for Congress to undertake the examination of these claims and the opening of this question. We can never know when we undertake to go into that question where we will land again. All of the testimony in these cases comes before you in a one-sided condition; all of it is ex parte necessarily. You are never certain whether you are doing justice to the claimant or injustice to the Government. Therefore I myself insist where a claim has been cognizable by a tribunal competent to act upon it and the claim has not been presented that it should be taken as an argument against the claim. I should prefer for my own part the reference of the claim to the Court of Claims. The only reason why it can not go would be, if it exists, the bar of the statute of limitations, and I do not recall at this moment any such bar. If there is no bar of limitation, he is entitled to go there with this claim and I should prefer that course.

Mr. STORM. If there is we can remove it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should not like to remove it in a single case if it exists. But by special enactment certain claims may be committed to it.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should not have admitted that there were no vouchers in this case. There are, perhaps, as good vouchers as can be asked in any case. It is true that they may not be in exact form or in the form that is ordinarily used, but at the time that these goods were taken the general directed that they should be paid for, and on December 14, 1865, General Weitzel indorsed the claim and directed General Wright, at Galveston, to have it paid in full.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me ask the gentleman what excuse is given for the non-payment of the claim under the circumstances?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Simply that they did not have the money; the same reason that is given for the non-payment of hundreds and thousands of claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has my friend an official statement of that fact?

Mr. HISCOCK. Let me ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question. I see in the report that on July 4, 1864, the Quartermaster's Department had not jurisdiction. Will the gentleman say why?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Because this was in Texas, one of the States in which, as I understand it, that act did not give jurisdiction. It only related, as I now remember, to certain States—to Tennessee and portions of Virginia and the loyal States.

Mr. HOLMAN. It applied to all of the loyal States, including Tennessee and West Virginia.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. It did not apply, however, to the Gulf States. There was no tribunal or court before which he could have presented his claim until the Commissioners of Claims were authorized to consider them, and when that was organized it had been already presented to Congress. That court lasted, as I remember, only about two years. Ever since it has been vigorously prosecuted before Congress, and so far unsuccessfully. It has been unsuccessful because it has again and again failed to be reached on the Calendar. It has never been rejected or unfavorably reported.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should be glad to have the gentleman answer the question that I propounded.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. What is it?

Mr. HOLMAN. I put the question to you how it happened that this claim was not paid? My friend's answer was that there were no funds out of which to pay it. Now I ask the question, is there an official statement to that effect?

Mr. HISCOCK. I would like to ask this question, wherein this claim differs from all the cases in which property was taken in States in insurrection by the Federal Army?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. In this respect, this claimant is proved to be a loyal man——

Mr. HISCOCK. That does not appear.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. He was a person of Spanish descent——

Mr. HISCOCK. There is not a suggestion of any proof of loyalty in the report.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. The report does not cite all of the facts in the case, but I refer the gentleman to the testimony of the three commanding officers contained in that report. There are a large number of affidavits proving the loyalty of the claimant. As I have said, he was of Spanish descent, and had not by family connection or otherwise any interest in the rebellion. On the contrary, the proof shows beyond all doubt that his sympathies were with the Union cause.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems that he was in the Southern service in some way. In what way?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Simply as the driver of a wagon, when he was compelled to be by the presence and command of rebel troops. It would not have been conducive to his health or safety to refuse.

Mr. HOLMAN. And he makes affidavit to that effect?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. And other parties make similar affidavits?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Yes; his statement is corroborated by the statements of others, his neighbors, and officers of the Union Army.

Mr. COSGROVE. And they got his property?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. COSGROVE. And he has never been paid for it?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. He never has been paid for it. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that the question of loyalty is the first question which we consider in these cases. And I will also say for the satisfaction of that gentleman that if a man is found by our committee to be loyal, you may be pretty certain that he was loyal. The committee is not so organized that the claims of men who were disloyal find any encouragement.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now as to the matter of payment.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. As to the matter of payment I will be perfectly frank and say that I do not now remember the precise reason why he was not paid. It is very clear, however, that that fact ought not to weigh in the consideration of this case. The officers in direct command of those forces never had any very large quantities of money at their disposal. We had the statements of those officers, as explicit as statements could be made, that this claimant ought to have been paid.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman says that there was an order of General Weitzel for the payment of the money.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe my friend thought in the first place that the reason the money was not paid was because there was no fund from which to pay it.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I said that I supposed that was the reason, and I suppose so yet.

Mr. HOLMAN. There ought to be some evidence on that point. That is the trouble with the examination of all these claims before Congress. We never know anything about them; it is mere guesswork at the very best.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. That objection does not lie alone against this claim.

Mr. HOLMAN. It lies against all of them.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. To the whole system of appropriating money for the payment of private claims?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. It applies to all the claims presented before Congress with equal force.

Mr. HOLMAN. We supposed we had got rid of these claims when we passed the law referring all claims against the Government, which were cognizable at all, to the Court of Claims; but the fact is that we have more claims here now than ever before. Instead of gaining anything by the passage of that act to refer all these matters to the Court of Claims the fact is that the number of claims before Congress is increasing, and the number reported from committees is now beyond all precedent.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I will leave it to the statesmanship of the gentleman to frame a bill which will relieve us of the trouble which he suggests. Suffice it to say that the laws of the land are such that there is no court of justice in which this claim can be prosecuted. The Court of Claims would have no jurisdiction of this case without a special act of Congress. The gentleman from Indiana complains of the present system; but he would be the last man to send these claimants to the Court of Claims. That is precisely the remedy which thousands of them are asking. Give to claimants from States which were disloyal that right, and within a year suits would be brought involving $20,000,000. And under the decisions of the Supreme Court no man can say how many millions the Government would be compelled to pay.

Under the present system Congress can exercise its discretion, paying those who were loyal and refusing payment to the disloyal. I will heartily second any plan which will improve the present system, but we of the Committee on War Claims have seen enough to warn us that it is a question which must be handled with care.

The delays of Congress are not favorable to unjust claims or indeed to just ones. We should take more than one thought before we open the courts to the indiscriminate consideration of Southern claims.

Until the gentleman from Indiana or some one else can suggest some remedy Congress must listen to claims of this character. To refuse would be repudiation of the worst character. No claims can be more meritorious than those of the men who were loyal to the Union in those districts where disloyalty was the rule and where loyalty meant the facing of every danger.

Mr. HOLMAN. I helped to frame the bill which I have referred to, but still these claims continue to come here. We did the best we could to frame a proper bill in the last Congress.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I now move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must ask for a vote on that motion.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 101, noes 7.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made that no quorum has voted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say that for the purpose of having a test vote on the question of paying this class of claims, I will be very glad to withdraw the point of order of no quorum, with the understanding that there shall be a yea-and-nay vote on this bill when it shall be reached in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the proposition that a yea-and-nay vote be taken in the House on this bill?

Mr. HISCOCK. How is it possible for the Committee of the Whole to bind the House in that matter?

Mr. HOLMAN. I take it for granted that an agreement made here would bind the members present.

The CHAIRMAN. The members of the committee can bind themselves. If there is no objection, that will be considered as the understanding.

There was no objection; and the bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MYRA CLARK GAINES.

The next business on the Private Calender was the bill (H. R. 1000) for the relief of Myra Clark Gaines.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas it appears that Myra Clark Gaines, as the legal representative of Daniel Clark, deceased, of Louisiana, is entitled to 39,737 arpens of land, being a portion of a grant made by Spain to Thomas Urquhart, and 5,470 arpens, being a portion of a grant made by Spain to John Lynd, amounting altogether to 45,207 arpens, equal to 38,457 acres of land: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That patents shall issue in the usual manner to Myra Clark Gaines, her heirs and assigns, for all of the aforesaid lands which the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall find to be vacant, unappropriated, and undisposed of by the United States, which patents shall operate only as a relinquishment of title on the part of the United States, and shall not in any wise impair or preclude any adverse claimant or claimants from the right to assert the validity of their claim or claims in a court or courts of justice: Provided, That no mineral lands shall be granted by this act or located by the scrip to be issued pursuant to this act.

SEC. 2. That for all of said lands which have been disposed of by the United States, or otherwise lawfully appropriated, the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall issue in lieu thereof certificates of location of the character prescribed by the sixth section of the act of Congress approved June 22, 1860, entitled "An act for the final adjustment of private land claims in the States of Florida, Louisiana, and Missouri, and for other purposes."

SEC. 3. That the provisions of the act of Congress approved January 28, 1879, entitled "An act defining the manner in which certain land-scrip may be assigned and located or applied by actual settlers, and providing for the issue of patents in the name of the locator or his legal representatives," shall apply to all the certificates of location which are issued under this act as aforesaid.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe this bill is reported by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON]. It will undoubtedly give rise to a very prolonged debate, and I suggest to that gentleman that it be passed over informally.

Mr. COSGROVE. The bill was not reported by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I introduced the bill originally, but the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] reported it from the Committee on Private Land Claims and has charge of it. I have no objection to any arrangement which the Committee of the Whole may make.

Mr. COSGROVE. I certainly do not want to consent, and will not consent, that this bill should be passed over; it should be disposed of in its order. This question has been before Congress for years, and there have been three or four reports of committees favorable to this claim. Here is another report in favor of the claim, and I think the Committee of the Whole should now proceed to act upon it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust my friend from Missouri will not insist on the committee proceeding with this bill to-day. I am not only opposed to the bill in its main features but I am opposed especially to the issue of land-scrip. I would rather see the Government do anything else than that. I think no policy would be more fatal.

There are several bills which have been laid aside to be reported favorably which should be acted upon by the House, and it has been agreed that the yeas and nays shall be taken on one of them, which will occupy some time. I therefore move that the committee rise.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that before that is done he should allow the report accompanying the bill to be read, in order that it may be printed in the RECORD and examined by those who are to act upon it hereafter.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well; I withdraw the motion until the report is read.

Mr. COSGROVE. Mr. Chairman, I have not yielded the floor; and I do not understand how gentlemen can take me off the floor by the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] has the floor.

Mr. COSGROVE. I have no objection to the report being read, neither have I any objection to the committee now rising, but I do not want this bill to be displaced. I want it to be considered in its order on the Calendar. If gentlemen want the report to be read I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Missouri that if the committee should now rise the pending bill will not be passed over, but will retain its place on the Calendar to be considered when the House shall again go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I am willing that instead of the report being now read it shall be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HOLMAN. The report is quite a long one, and there is scarcely time enough for its reading now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] asks unanimous consent that the report be printed in the RECORD without being read. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it is entirely too long a report to be printed in the RECORD, and we all have it in our rooms.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I withdraw the request as to the printing of the report, and move that the committee rise and report its action to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report back sundry bills with various recommendations.

ASSISTANT ENGINEER JOHN W. SAVILLE.

The first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House was the bill (H. R. 2240) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Assistant Engineer John W. Saville a passed assistant engineer on the retired-list of the Navy, reported with an amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JAMES H. AYERS.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 723) for the relief of James H. Ayers.

The bill was reported back with the recommendation that a resolution be adopted referring the bill to the Court of Claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to add what I send to the desk to the resolution reported by the committee.

The Clerk read the resolution as proposed to be amended, as follows:

Resolved, That the pending bill be referred to the Court of Claims under an act entitled "An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims against the Government," approved March 3, 1883.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That is right.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles, reported without amendment from the Committee of the Whole, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 116) for the relief of the sureties of the late J. O. Rawlins;

A bill (H. R. 3936) for the relief of Benjamin F. Millard; and

A bill (H. R. 1327) for the relief of J. H. Hammond.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. JOHNSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 57) for the relief of settlers and purchasers of lands on the public domain in the States of Nebraska and Kansas;

A bill (S. 453) for the relief of Coronna, Taussig & Co. and others;

A bill (S. 848) to amend section 2776 of the Revised Statutes, so as to authorize the unlading of coal, salt, railroad iron, and other like articles in bulk under the superintendence of customs officers, at the expense of parties interested, at places to be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury within the collection district;

A bill (S. 1148) for the relief of William B. Moses;

A bill (S. 1149) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880;

A bill (S. 1432) for the relief of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia; and

A bill (S. 1871) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to offer a reward of $25,000 for rescuing or ascertaining the fate of the Greely relief expedition.

SANTIAGO DE LEON.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar with a favorable recommendation was the bill (H. R. 1724) for the relief of Santiago de Leon; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. On the passage of this bill I call for the yeas and nays.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY.

Mr. RANDALL. Prior to the taking of the yeas and nays upon the pending bill I desire to make a privileged motion—that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next. I think I make this motion in obedience to a general wish on both sides of the House.

The question was taken; but before the result was announced,

Mr. RANDALL said: Mr. Speaker, I made this motion as much at the instance of members on the other side as on this side; but as gentlemen on the other side seem to vote against it, I withdraw the motion.

[Cries of "Oh, no!"]

Mr. CHACE. I renew the motion.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question having being taken,

The SPEAKER said: On ordering the yeas and nays the ayes are 16, the noes 95.

Mr. BLAND. Is it in order to call for tellers?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BLAND. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering tellers, there were 13 voting in the affirmative—not one-fifth of a quorum.

Mr. BLAND. I make the point that no quorum voted on ordering the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The point is made that no quorum has voted upon the demand for the yeas and nays.

Several MEMBERS. Too late!

The SPEAKER. The Chair had not announced the result. No quorum having voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. STEELE. Had not the Chair announced the result?

The SPEAKER. The Chair had announced the vote, but had not announced the result of the vote. The point being made that no quorum voted, the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Rhode Island, Mr. CHACE, and the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. BLAND.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 23, noes 136.

The SPEAKER. Is the point of no quorum still insisted upon?

Several MEMBERS. It is.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Is not a motion to adjourn in order?

The SPEAKER. It is. A motion to adjourn is always in order.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The point that no quorum has voted is still insisted upon, and the gentleman from Maryland moves that the House adjourn.

Mr. MATSON. If the House should adjourn it would dispense with the session of this evening for pension bills.

Mr. CHACE. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. DUNN. I rise to a point of order. Before the question is put on the motion to adjourn is it in order to insist that the tellers retain their places?

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is in order at any time.

Mr. DUNN. Pending a division?

The SPEAKER. It is when there is no quorum. The tellers had announced the vote.

Mr. DUNN. I did not know they had made the announcement.

Mr. TALBOTT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Does not the motion to adjourn over take precedence of the motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. It does; but the motion to adjourn over requires a quorum for its decision, and the motion merely to adjourn does not.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOBLITZELL] moves that the House now adjourn.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House now take a recess until half-past 7 o'clock, to meet under the order for Friday-night sessions.

The SPEAKER. That motion would require a quorum.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HOBLITZELL that the House adjourn, it was not agreed to, there being—ayes 32, noes 83.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I move a call of the House.

Mr. MATSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Can not the count by tellers be now resumed? I think a quorum is now present.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is not the House now dividing on the motion to adjourn until Monday? The motion to adjourn only took precedence of that.

The SPEAKER. But pending the motion that when the House adjourns it be to meet on Monday next, the fact was disclosed that there was no quorum. Thereupon, under the rules of the House, a motion was made to adjourn. The rule is that when it appears there is no quorum present, but two motions are in order—a motion to adjourn and a motion for a call of the House.

Mr. TALBOTT. I renew the motion that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand that the point of no quorum was not withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. It was not.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then, the motion to adjourn having been defeated, is not the next business in order the continuation of the vote upon which there was no quorum?

The SPEAKER. It is, unless some motion be made which takes precedence——

Mr. HISCOCK. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GEORGE D. WISE] moved a call of the House.

Mr. CHACE. I understand the gentleman from Virginia does not insist on that motion.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I withdraw it.

Mr. CHACE. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays upon that motion, which is still pending. If there be no objection the tellers will resume their places.

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire to ask whether this motion cuts out the session for pension bills this evening.

The SPEAKER. It does not. The motion is that when the House adjourns the adjournment shall be till Monday next; but the question immediately pending is on the demand for the yeas and nays. The tellers will resume their places.

Mr. McMILLIN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. If members are now present who did not vote can they now pass through the tellers?

The SPEAKER. The vote has been announced.

Mr. WAIT. If members who did not vote wish to vote to make a quorum, can they not, by unanimous consent, pass between the tellers and be counted?

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent it can be done. The vote was complete, and it appeared there was no quorum.

Mr. WAIT. I ask, by unanimous consent, that the gentlemen who did not vote before be permitted to pass through the tellers and vote.

Mr. PAYSON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will request the tellers again to take their places, as no quorum appeared on the last vote.

Mr. CHACE. Is this a new vote?

The SPEAKER. It is; and the question is on ordering the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn until Monday next.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 17, noes 146.

So (one-fifth not having voted in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. BLAND. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 101, noes 35.

Mr. BLAND. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. BLAND and Mr. CHACE.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 130, noes 31.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the affirmative, and the ayes have it. [Applause.]

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLIN moved to reconsider the several votes which had been taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MATSON. I now move that the House take a recess until 7.30 this evening.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Before announcing the result of the vote, the Chair desires to state that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] will occupy the chair during the evening session.

The result of the vote was then announced; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 7.30 p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 7 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m., Mr. McMILLIN in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the order of the House under which the session of this evening is held.

The Clerk read as follows:

That until the further order of this House, on each Friday the House will take a recess at 5 o'clock until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions shall be considered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WEMPLE, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. FOLLETT, until Monday next, by reason of absence on Appropriation Committee.

To Mr. DUNCAN, for one week from this day.

To Mr. POTTER, until Tuesday next.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MATSON moved that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House, on the Private Calendar Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House the committee resumes the consideration of pension cases on the Private Calendar.

LEVI ANDERSON.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3625) granting an increase of pension to Levi Anderson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That in lieu of the pension of $30 per month which Levi Anderson is now receiving under act of Congress approved March 3, 1883, for a gunshot wound in the left hip-joint, there is hereby granted to said Anderson the sum of $50 per month, commencing from March 1, 1884, on account of said gunshot wound in the left hip-joint, and also on account of a gunshot wound in the right shoulder, both of said wounds having been received by him in an engagement with rebel troops at White Oak, Jackson County, Missouri, and both of said injuries resulting now in total disability of said Anderson.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, having considered the petition (and papers accompanying) of Levi Anderson, late private in Company A, Seventh Kansas Cavalry, asking an increase of pension, find that said soldier was wounded on the 11th day of November, 1861, receiving a bad fracture of the thigh bone, the result of a gunshot wound received in the battle at White Oak, Jackson County, Missouri. He was treated for two years in the United States hospital, and then discharged. The leg is seven inches shorter than the other, and is useless. He also received a gunshot wound in his shoulder. He was pensioned from the date of his discharge at the rate of $8 per month, which was increased in 1871 to $15, and in August, 1872, to $18. In 1882, by special act, it was increased to $30. He now asks that he be allowed $50 per month. From the excessive disability existing, entirely incapacitating him from all labor, we recommend that the bill be amended so as to give him a pension of $40 per month, commencing from and after the passage of this act.

The amendments of the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out "fifty," and insert "forty," so it will read, "$40 a month;" strike out "March, 1884," and insert, "the passage of this act."

Mr. MORRILL. This bill under consideration provides that the pension now granted to Levi Anderson, late a private of Company A, Seventh Kansas Cavalry, be increased from $30 per month to $50. I propose to state briefly the reasons why this increase should be made; and it is with a feeling of intense satisfaction that I stand here to-day pleading that justice may be done my old comrade, for we went forth from the same county in that young and devoted State that had the honor of leading all others in the relative number sent into the service as well as in the sacrifices made, for the list of her dead and wounded shows a larger percentage than that of any other State.

In September, 1861, Levi Anderson, then a young, healthy, vigorous man, with all the promise of a long and useful life before him, enlisted in the United States volunteer service, and leaving home and friends, all that was near and dear to him, offered his services to his country. It was an hour of terrible peril. The wisest and the bravest looked with gloomy fears upon the contest then just commencing. This young man with hundreds of thousands of others, the bone and sinew of the country, rushed to the defense of the old flag. Two short months quickly passed amid the exciting scenes of war and all this man's prospects of life were blasted. It was a bright, beautiful, Indian-summer morning in November when we were ordered to March from Kansas City. I shall never forget that day. Our horses fresh with the weeks of comparative rest that had been devoted to the drill, the gaudy trimmings glittering in the sun, the martial music filling the air, no party of young people ever went more merrily to a dance. We had marched but a few miles when our advance guard, companies A and B of Seventh Kansas Cavalry, found a detachment of rebels securely posted behind the rocks and trees on the banks of the Little Blue at White-Oaks. Notwithstanding the disadvantages of position the attack was at once made.

The fight was a short one. Our brave boys were obliged to fall back, but they brought their wounded with them, and of those who that day suffered the terrible effects of war was Levi Anderson. He received a gunshot wound in his thigh, fracturing the bone badly, and another in his shoulder. We took him back to Kansas City and placed him in the hospital, where he had the attention and care that it was possible to bestow under the circumstances. For weeks he waged a hand-to-hand fight with the grim monster, Death. It seemed impossible that he could survive the fearful injuries he had received.

In the morning the attendants said to each other, "He will be beyond our care before another sunset." And when the evening shades again gathered they said, "How tenaciously he clings to life." But youth and a strong, vigorous constitution conquered, and slowly day by day he grew stronger. Weeks and months passed by, and still he was confined to that cot. It was two long years of suffering and pain, two years of hell on earth, before he was able to leave that hospital, crushed and broken down, all life's bright prospects blighted. He was then discharged; like an old, worn-out horse, of no further use to his master, he was turned out to pasture, to linger and to die.

He returned to his farm a physical wreck, unable to work it and too poor to employ any one else; unfitted by education to engage in the lighter duties of a clerk or book-keeper, he has struggled along enduring all the privations of poverty. For seven years our glorious Government, in her grateful remembrance of his devotion and loyalty and to compensate him for his terrible suffering, magnanimously gave him $8 per month. This was increased in 1871 to $15, and in 1872 to $18, and for ten more years he received this sum—less than the inexperienced boy who worked on his neighbor's farm was receiving. These sums he received from the Pension Office under the general laws.

In 1882, by special act of Congress, it was increased to $30 per month. The act of June 18, 1874, provides that in the case of "the loss of both hands or both feet, or by any other injury resulting in total and permanent helplessness," the pensioner shall receive $50 per month, this to be granted only where injuries result in permanent total helplessness, requiring the regular personal aid and attendance of another person. In the case of the loss of both hands or both feet or both eyes by the subsequent act of 1878 a pension of $72 per month is allowed.

It is utterly impossible in any general law to fix a rating that equitably meets every case. The law as it now stands provides what the pension shall be when the regular personal aid and attendance of another person is required, but it does not in any way provide for those cases where the partial attendance of another person is required. The poor cripple who requires the assistance of another for three months or six months or even nine months in the year gets no more than he who does not require the assistance of another for a single day, while the pensioner who requires the constant attendance, no matter how light the duties, of another gets more than double the amount.

While I plead that justice may be done my old comrade, who I know has suffered as but few of his fellow-soldiers ever suffered, and who I know to be worthy and deserving, I do not ask for him, and he would not ask for himself, that he be treated any differently from what his brave associates are. He only asks that he receive the same as those who suffered like disability; that while he drags around the useless limb, which is seven inches shorter than the other, he should be allowed the same as though the limb had been amputated, for he would certainly be no worse off with an artificial limb. For weeks past he has been helpless and has required the constant assistance of others; but he hopes and believes that it will not be necessary at all times to have an attendant; that as the spring returns with its milder air he will be able to care for himself.

But the stubborn, unyielding fact remains. All these years he has been a physical wreck. All his prospects in life have been blasted. He has not been able to accumulate property and provide for old age as others have done. His only thought has been to be able to provide for the wants of each returning day. And now he asks you to place him on the same footing with others equally disabled.

The committee, in considering his case, decided that, inasmuch as he does not require the "regular personal aid and attendance of another person," he ought not to have the full pension of $50. As a matter of fact he requires the services of others more hours in the year than the strong healthy person who has lost both hands or both feet. The committee were unanimously of the opinion that he was justly entitled to a higher pension than could be granted under the general law, and therefore fixed the amount at $40.

I ask the passage of the bill because it is a simple act of justice to a brave soldier who freely offered his life for his country, and who has suffered as is required of but few to suffer. I ask it because others who are less disabled and who suffer less under the inequalities of the general law receive it. I ask it in behalf of the gallant soldiers of the fighting Seventh Kansas, who will all rejoice to have their unfortunate comrade so justly remembered.

The amendments were agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM J. LEE.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the next bill, No. 1073, for the relief of William J. Lee, be passed over informally without action, for the reason that there was some dispute about this bill when it was last before the committee. This is one of the bills that proposes to grant a pension to a scout, and there is some controversy about it. I ask, therefore, that it be informally passed over.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

HELEN M. HARRISON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2325) granting a pension to Helen M. Harrison.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Helen M. Harrison, widow of Alexander R. Harrison, late a private in Company F, Tenth Regiment Minnesota Volunteers.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2325) granting a pension to Helen M. Harrison, having had said bill under consideration, hereby report in favor of the same, recommend its passage, and ask that said committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

LAURA C. P. HASKINS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2319) granting a pension to Laura C. P. Haskins.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Laura C. P. Haskins, widow of H. D. Haskins, as a lieutenant in the One hundred and tenth Regiment New York Volunteers.

The committee recommend the addition of the following amendment:

Add at the end of the bill the following words:

"From and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the pension now granted to her."

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom the bill (H. R. 2319) granting a pension to Laura C. P. Haskins was referred, having had the same under consideration, hereby report favorably thereon, recommend its passage, and ask that said committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof; provided, however, that said bill be amended by adding at the end thereof the words, "from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the pension now granted to her."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move that the title of the bill be amended by striking out the word "Laura" and inserting the word "Laurena;" also, in line 6 of the bill, strike out the word "Laura" and insert the word "Laurena," and in line 8, after the word "volunteers," insert the words "and to pay her the pension of a lieutenant's widow."

The amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The title of the bill can be amended after the passage of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALBERT O. LAUFMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1397) granting a pension to Albert O. Laufman, late second lieutenant of Company A, Sixty-third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Albert O. Laufman, late a second lieutenant of Company A, Sixty-third Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The report is as follows:

That Albert O. Laufman was second lieutenant of Company A, Sixty-third Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers. He served from August 31, 1861, to July 26, 1862, having been mustered in as second lieutenant March 5, 1862. While in front of Richmond, in June, 1862, he contracted rheumatism in his back from exposure in the swamps of the Peninsula and was poisoned by poisonous vines. It is made evident by numerous affidavits that when Lieutenant Laufman entered the service he was sound and healthy. It is stated by Capt. W. P. Hunker, who commanded the company in which Lieutenant Laufman was second lieutenant, that he "saw Lieutenant Laufman in an ambulance at Harrison's Landing, unable to walk, face badly swollen, and appeared to be suffering considerable pain."

It appears from the affidavit of W. H. Morrow that Lieutenant Laufman, while in the line of duty, about the 1st of June, 1862, became disabled from poison, which affected him like erysipelas, and causing rheumatism. Lieut. W. A. Haymaker, and Private J. L. Paul, and other comrades of the same company testify to the same effect. It is satisfactorily shown that the petitioner became afflicted while in the line of duty, and by reason thereof had to leave the service. On his return home he was treated by Drs. King and Wilson, and subsequently by Dr. Radinsky. Dr. King died before the petitioner made application for a pension, and Dr. Wilson could not be found. Dr. Radinsky says that he has known the petitioner since 1878, and at different times since he has attended him for rheumatism and idiopathic neuralgia.

"He suffered acutely at times, so much so that his eyes were affected by the light—photophobia—and he has been obliged to wear glasses since I knew him. I have no doubt but that the trouble has a malarial origin, contracted while in the Army."

The claim was rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions on the certificate of the examining board, which accounted the disability of Lieutenant Laufman nothing. Dr. Radinsky and Dr. Perchmentaver that there is a pronounced disability, and in this conclusion they are corroborated by a large number of affidavits from near neighbors of the petitioner.

Under all the evidence, your committee believes that the bill should pass, and it therefore reports the bill with that recommendation.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS E. WILSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2714) to increase the pension of Thomas E. Wilson.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to increase the pension of Thomas E. Wilson, late of Company H, Sixty-second Pennsylvania Volunteers, from $24 per month to $30 per month, the said Wilson having had his eyesight so much impaired by a gunshot wound in the left eye as to make the loss of eyesight practically, although not absolutely, total; to take effect from and after the passage of this act.

The committee recommend an amendment by striking out the word "thirty," in line 6 of the bill, and inserting the word "forty."

The report is as follows:

That Private Thomas E. Wilson enlisted in the Sixty-second Pennsylvania Regiment July 4, 1861, to serve three years; that he was then 23 years of age; that he was discharged from service February 23, 1863, for disability occasioned from gunshot wound in the left eye, causing total blindness of said eye and very much weakening the right eye, and was pensioned March 8, 1863, at $8 per month; increased June 6, 1866, to $15 per month; increased February 7, 1872, to $20 per month; increased June 4, 1872, to $24 per month; and since the last date of increase it has been growing until he is now almost entirely blind. He therefore asks that he may have his pension increased.

He has furnished the sworn statement of two oculists and three physicians, based upon recent examinations, and all concur in the fact that he is practically, although not totally, blind. He is now receiving the highest rate of pension allowed for those whose sight has been injured but not totally destroyed. His only relief is by the enactment of a private law. He asks for $40 per month.

The committee are of the opinion he should have $40 per month, and they recommend that the bill be so amended, and then ask that the bill do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

REBECCA J. PIERCE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4141) for the relief of Mrs. Rebecca J. Pierce.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Mrs. Rebecca J. Pierce, widow of David A. Pierce, late of Company I, Twenty-fourth Missouri Volunteer Infantry, be placed on the pension-roll; and the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay her at the rate of $8 per month.

The committee recommend the striking out of all after the word "pension-roll," in line 5, and insert in lieu thereof the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Mr. HEPBURN. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the reports be dispensed with except in instances where gentlemen desire them to be read for information.

Mr. CRISP. The only objection is that a member will not know from the reading of the bill when it is desirable or necessary to have the report read. I think it is better that they should be read in each case.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read.

The report was read. It is as follows:

That David A. Pierce enlisted August 19, 1861, at Rollo, Mo., and was a sound, able-bodied man.

That on the 9th day of April, 1864, at the battle of Pleasant Hill, La., he was wounded in right side of body above hip, was left on battlefield, taken prisoner, and carried to Camp Tyler, Texas, and there remained a prisoner until shortly before discharge.

The evidence discloses said Pierce was treated in field hospital at Pleasant Hill about two months, and was held a prisoner about eight months; that he was attacked by a sharp pain in region of right lung, attended with cough.

That said Pierce received pension on application, and died on or about last of September, 1878.

On March 29, 1879, Rebecca J. Pierce, widow of said David Pierce, made application for pension.

There is no question of her marriage nor of the birth of her four children by said David A. Pierce, namely, Nancy A. Pierce, born November 14, 1866; Thomas W. Pierce, born August 29, 1869; Kelly J. Pierce, born January 18, 1873; Mary A. Pierce, born May 24, 1875.

On the 6th day of October, 1883, application was rejected, because, as stated by Commissioner, "She is unable to show and connect death cause, 'consumption,' with soldier's service and line of duty."

The assistant surgeon who was left with wounded on battlefield says so long a time has intervened he can not remember the case.

But there is no question under the evidence he (Pierce) was wounded at the time mentioned, left on the battlefield, taken prisoner, and held as such for months.

In 1877, a short period before the death of Pierce, he was carefully examined by three reputable and credible physicians, who certify, and verify their certificate by affidavit, as follows, among other things: That he had tuberculous condition of the lungs; that he had always complained of pain in lungs from the time he returned home, and that he had a cough which was sometimes relieved by treatment, but never cured.

And said physicians further state their belief that the disability is a consequence of the exposure and wounds received in the service of the United States, which has gradually undermined the constitution and made his disability total.

One of the above physicians, Dr. White, who was his family physician, and who treated him continuously from 1865 to date of his death, swears—

"That he (Pierce) had received a gunshot wound which brought about consumption; that the wound debilitated his whole system, and was so near the lung that the pus was carried into the lung by absorption, causing tubercles, and also poisoning the blood by circulation."

This widow and the orphan children are being supported by their neighbors.

Your committee therefore recommend that said widow, Rebecca J. Pierce, be placed on the pension-roll and receive such pension as the law gives her, and that the bill be amended by striking out all after the words "pension-roll," in fifth line, and inserting the words "subject to provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CORNELIUS FITZGERALD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 282) to reinstate Cornelius Fitzgerald on the pension-roll.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to reinstate the name of Cornelius Fitzgerald, late a private in Company G, One hundred and sixth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and holding certificate numbered 127269, on the pension-roll, and that he be paid his pension as provided by law from the date of the suspension of the same.

The report is as follows:

Your committee have examined the papers in this case with care, and are of the opinion that injustice was inadvertently done the petitioner when his name was stricken from the pension-roll on ex parte testimony taken by a special examiner, most of said testimony being based on rumor in camp at the time the disability was incurred. The committee adopt the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the Forty-seventh Congress and make it their own, which is as follows:

"[House Report No. 1250, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3582) to reinstate Cornelius Fitzgerald on the pension-roll, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to make the following report:

"Cornelius Fitzgerald enlisted on the 5th day of August, 1862, and was mustered into Company G, One hundred and sixth Illinois Volunteers, at Lincoln, Ill., on the 17th day of September, 1862, for three years or during the war. He served with his company and regiment until January 7, 1865, when he received a gunshot wound in the left leg, fired by the provost guard in the town of Pine Bluff, Ark., which resulted in the amputation of the leg above the knee. The Adjutant-General's report to the Commissioner of Pensions, dated June 8, 1866, says:

"'Records on file report him discharged at Pine Bluff, Ark., July 17, 1865, of gunshot wound received January 7, 1865, said to have been received while resisting the provost guard at Pine Bluff.'

"Pending the application for pension proof was furnished which satisfied the Adjutant-General that the record in his office was erroneous, and it was amended. Under date of February 14, 1874, he reported to the Commissioner of Pensions that—

"'Certificate of disability reports him discharged at Pine Bluff, Ark., July 17, 1865, because of amputation of left thigh from gunshot wound received January 7, 1865, while in the line of duty.'

"After a protracted examination of the case and correction of the record in the Adjutant-General's office, as above, a pension was granted to Fitzgerald March 17, 1874, at the rate of $8 per month, commencing July 18, 1865; $15 a month from June 6, 1866; and $18 a month from June 4, 1872. This amount was increased to $24 a month from June 4, 1874.

"Payment of pension was suspended by order of the Commissioner of Pensions May 23, 1878, on the report of a special agent, on the ground that the injury was not received by the soldier while in the line of duty, and his name was finally stricken from the pension-roll.

"The question in this case is one of fact. The testimony taken by the special agent is quite voluminous, all of which we have carefully examined. It is mostly by soldiers of the regiment in which Fitzgerald served. It consists largely of what was rumored in camp at the time of the shooting. But few of the witnesses had personal knowledge of the facts, and nearly all of them subsequently made affidavits, which are on file, stating that their former testimony was based wholly on camp rumor.

"Fitzgerald's own statement under oath is substantially that while in camp in the outskirts of the village of Pine Bluff, Ark., having stood guard during the night on the 7th of January, 1865, he got a verbal permit from Lieut. Henry Roach, commanding the company, to go into the village and purchase of the sutler some tobacco for said Lieutenant Roach. He left the camp at about 9 o'clock a. m., and made the purchase without loss of time. At about 10 o'clock, while walking up the street toward the camp, he heard a noise in his rear, there being some soldiers on the street, who were somewhat disorderly, and heard the command 'Halt!' On turning round he was struck by a gunshot in the left leg above the knee. The shot was fired by the provost guard, who was patroling the town. He says he was sober, having taken but one drink with Thomas Hardin but a few minutes before, the said Hardin being with or near him at the time of the shooting. There is positive testimony that the guard said he did not shoot at Fitzgerald, but at Thomas Hardin, who it is shown by other testimony was intoxicated and disorderly.

"The witnesses testifying before the special agent, as before stated, gave the camp rumor at the time, which was that Fitzgerald and Hardin while in the village had been drinking, and when halted by the provost guard started to run away, when the guard immediately fired. There seems to be no question but that Fitzgerald had the permission of his commanding officer to go into the village, nor is there any proof, save rumor, that he had at any time been acting in a disorderly manner. On the contrary, it is stated that he was a good soldier, sober, and well behaved.

"As before stated, the witnesses who testified before the special agent, in their counter affidavits, say their statements were made on rumor in camp, and that they believed Fitzgerald was in line of duty when shot.

"Thomas Hardin, who was with Fitzgerald when shot, says that he (Hardin) 'was the man halted and shot at, and that the shooting of Fitzgerald was accidental.' He states further:

"'The provost guard was trying to arrest this deponent, and not the said Fitzgerald, and that the said provost guard shot the said Fitzgerald by mistake; that the said Fitzgerald at the time he was shot was not resisting the provost guard or any one else, but peaceably walking along the street; that at the time the said Fitzgerald was shot he was in the line of duty, and was not nor had not been resisting the provost guard, or committing a breach of the peace, or was not infringing any rule of military discipline. Affiant further says that said Fitzgerald was a sober, obedient, faithful, and good soldier, and was punctual in the discharge of his duty.'

"William J. Pettit, late sergeant of Company G, One hundred and sixth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, testifies that he was not present when Fitzgerald was shot, but was told by several soldiers, who saw the whole affair, that Fitzgerald 'did not disobey the guard who shot him, but was orderly and in the line of duty;' and that Fitzgerald was a 'number one soldier, true and faithful at all times, and that he never knew or heard of his being arrested, prior to the time above stated, for disobedience of orders or any other misdemeanor whatever.'

"George W. Thomas, a comrade, testifies that he was within 'fifteen or twenty feet' of Fitzgerald when he was shot, and 'and knows, of his own personal knowledge, that he was orderly and did not disobey the orders of the guard who shot him;' that one Thomas Hardin, in said Fitzgerald's company, was present at the time, and was boisterous and drunk; that said Thomas Hardin was arrested by the said provost guard, and, while trying to escape from them, the said Fitzgerald was shot, not from any disobedience of orders or from any provocation; that the shooting of said Fitzgerald was wholly due to the disorderly conduct and drunkenness of said Thomas Hardin.

"In view of the fact that Fitzgerald was a good soldier, who always performed his duties and was obedient to orders, it is not at all probable he would resist the orders of the provost guard. It appears conclusively proven that he was on his way to camp, and that his being shot was the result of a misdirected shot, aimed, if aimed at all, at Thomas Hardin.

"Your committee are of the opinion that injustice was inadvertently done this soldier. The witnesses upon whose testimony his name was stricken from the pension-roll have modified their statements, showing they were made on mere rumor, and testify strongly in his favor. We therefore recommend the passage of the bill (H. R. 3582) to restore the name of Cornelius Fitzgerald to the pension-roll."

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill (H. R. 282) to reinstate Cornelius Fitzgerald on the pension-roll.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES KING.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 267) granting a pension to James King.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pensions laws, the name of James King, late a private in Company F, First Regiment United States Infantry.

The report is as follows:

This case was presented to the Forty-sixth Congress, and the Committee on Pensions of the Senate made a favorable report, as follows:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of James King, private Company F, First Regiment United States Infantry, having examined the same, with the accompanying papers, find that the soldier was continuously in service from his first enlistment as a volunteer, in 1861, to the date of his discharge for disability, in 1870, from partial paralysis.

"His paralysis came on in 1869. His application for pension was rejected because, in the opinion of a board of examining surgeons, the disability was not incurred in the service and in the line of duty.

"The medical evidence in the case is conflicting to some extent. The existence of partial paralysis is fully established, and a degree of mental alienation coexists. Some of the surgeons attribute his present condition to a virulent attack of syphilis, while others declare that it had no such origin. The existence of the last-named disease prior to the occurrence of paralysis is, in the opinion of the committee, established, but whether the paralysis thus originated is very questionable. In consideration of this doubt, and of the additional fact that the petitioner served throughout the war with credit and fidelity, having participated in the battles of Winchester, Cedar Mountain, and Antietam, in 1862, Chancellorsville and Gettysburg, in 1863, and in Sherman's march, in 1864, the committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill."

This report was adopted by the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House, but the case was not reached during the Forty-sixth Congress.

The case was again presented to the Forty-seventh Congress, and the Committee on Invalid Pensions readopted the Senate report above, and also the following:

"Your committee has carefully examined all the evidence upon which the above-quoted report was based, and is of opinion that the conclusions reached by the two committees were well founded, in view of the strong medical certificate of Surgeon Abadie, medical director, Department of the Lakes, under date of January 20, 1871, which is as follows:

"'Partial paralysis of the right side; the right upper extremity is completely paralyzed and the right lower extremity partially. This soldier is able to walk, though with considerable difficulty. At times he shows unmistakable signs of mental aberration. These consist principally in the manifestations of ungovernable rage, arising from comparatively trivial causes. The organs of speech are much impaired, it being almost impossible to understand what he says; one remarkable fact has been observed from the beginning, the inclination to say "no" when "yes" was intended. The patient often seems conscious of the absurdity of the mistake, and immediately corrects himself. This soldier was wounded during the war, a musket-ball striking his breast one inch above and one inch to the left of the extremity of the xiphoid appendix. There is no scar showing the point of exit; probably the ball was extracted immediately. The patient's accounts of the matter are conflicting. In my opinion the disability is the result of hardships and exposure incident to the service. Amount of disability, total.'

"The medical record of the soldier during his last term of service shows treatment at various times for colic, intermittent fever (tert. and quot.), and neuralgia. The paralysis did not appear until subsequent to the last treatment shown for neuralgia, in October, 1868.

"The committee is clearly of opinion that the attack of syphilis immediately after discharge from first service, in May, 1864, resulted in no serious consequences, or else the rigid medical examinations to which recruits into the regular Army are subjected would have rejected him. Again, the absence of any reference to syphilis or its results in the hospital record, or the certificate of disability above quoted, should go far to remove doubts as to the real cause of the claimant's pitiful condition. The opinion expressed by the medical officer, 'that the disability is the result of hardships and exposure incident to the service,' is also the opinion of this committee, and the same therefore recommends that favorable action may be taken on the bill."

After a careful consideration of all the foregoing statements, your committee would report favorably, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. MARGARET STEEDMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1246) granting a pension to the widow of Maj. Gen. James P. Steedman.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the name of Mrs. Margaret Steedman, widow of the late Maj. Gen. James B. Steedman, be placed upon the pension-list, and that she be allowed $50 per month from the date of the death of the said General Steedman.

The report is as follows:

That Maj. Gen. James B. Steedman was an officer of singular ability and valor in the late war. As a reward for his efficiency as a soldier, his skill as a commander, and his personal gallantry on the field of battle, he passed through all the grades of the military service, from a captaincy to the position of major-general. His dauntless courage, heroic enthusiasm, and magnetic leadership are known to all familiar with the history of the Army of the Cumberland. He died October 14, 1883. During the last years of his life he drew a pension for disability occasioned by chronic rheumatism. His death resulted from pneumonia, aggravated by his army disease.

He was twice married. By his first wife he had one son, who was a private soldier, who died, leaving two children and a widow surviving. She afterward died; the orphans fell to the care of General Steedman. By his second wife he had three children, who survive him. His widow is left with the five children in her care, the oldest not yet 12 years of age, the youngest about 2. With the exception of a few hundred dollars unexpended from his pension-money (now exhausted) the widow was penniless at the time of his death. She lives in a rented one-story frame house, with the plainest furniture, and without even the ordinary conveniences of domestic life. Your committee believe that a grateful and generous country owes a decent bringing up to the children of this gallant soldier and a comfortable living to his poverty-stricken widow, and therefore recommend the passage of this bill.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I think this bill has been reported by some inadvertence so as to make it draw a little arrears. General Steedman died recently. I am quite sure it was not the intention to have reported the bill in that shape. The universal practice of the committee is not to grant arrears. I therefore move to amend by striking out in line 6 the words "the date of the death of General Steedman," and insert instead "the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLES MUNROE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2551) granting a pension to Charles Munroe.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles Munroe, late a private in Company G, Second Regiment United States Artillery.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2551) granting a pension to Charles Munroe, late a corporal in Company G, Second Regiment United States Artillery, have considered the same, and beg leave to submit the following report:

It appears that Charles Munroe, late corporal in Company G, Second Regiment United States Artillery, enlisted early in the late war of the rebellion. At the expiration of his first term of enlistment he re-enlisted, February 22, 1864, to serve three years. He participated in the first battle of Bull Run, July 21, 1861, and in twenty-one other general battles, campaigns, and sieges until the close of the war, including the Peninsular campaign, under McClellan, the Fredricksburg, Gettysburg, and Wilderness campaigns. H. C. Dodge, first lieutenant Second United States Artillery, indorses upon his second discharge the following:

"Charles Munroe served with me during the last two years of the war, and, in my opinion, is a most excellent soldier. He held the position of corporal.

"H. C. DODGE,
"First Lieutenant, Second Artillery."

At the close of his second term of service he again enlisted, March 8, 1867, in the same battery, to serve three years, which he did, and was honorably discharged March 8, 1870.

Early in 1872 he enlisted in the marine service of the United States, at San Francisco, and was assigned to duty on board the United States revenue-cutter Reliance. While serving on board this cutter he lost his right arm, as the following affidavits show:

UNITED STATES REVENUE STEAMER PERRY,
Erie, Pa., July 28, 1882.

I hereby certify that Charles Munroe served as quartermaster on board the United States revenue-cutter Reliance during the year 1872. While the crew were engaged firing a national salute, July 4, 1872, the said Charles Munroe had his arm blown off below the elbow by a premature discharge of the gun which he was serving at the time.

W. H. HAND,
Second Lieutenant, United States Revenue Marine.

Sworn and subscribed before me this 28th day of July, 1882.

S. V. HALLIVAY,
Prothonotary of the Court of Common Pleas of Erie County, Pennsylvania.

Also the affidavit of Robert M. Clark, first lieutenant, who served on the Reliance at the time, who testifies that he saw the accident, mentioning that it was his right arm that was blown off. This man gave nine years of his life to the service of his country. He was honorably discharged three times. He was a faithful, devoted, brave soldier, and participated in all the hard-fought battles of the late war. He is now unable to perform labor of any kind, is broken in health, and is absolutely in needy and indigent circumstances, without means, health, or friends. In February, 1882, he applied for admission to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, located near Dayton, Ohio, but was denied admission thereto upon the grounds that under existing laws he was not eligible to the benefits of the Home.

Under all the circumstances your committee feel that while the claimant may not have a legal right to a pension it is a meritorious case, and they therefore report in favor of the bill, and recommend that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

SARAH L. HARVEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1491) granting a pension to Sarah L. Harvey, mother of G. B. Harvey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to cause the name of Sarah L. Harvey, mother of G. B. Harvey, deceased, late first lieutenant of Company E, Tenth Tennessee Cavalry, to be placed on the pension-roll of the United States, according to the rules and law governing such claims.

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. HOUK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted the following report (to accompany bill H. R. 1491):

Sarah L. Harvey made application to the Commissioner of Pensions, seeking to be pensioned as the dependent mother of Gilbert B. Harvey, first lieutenant Company E, Tenth Tennessee Cavalry. The proof clearly shows her dependence on her said son for support. It appears from the evidence that her husband deserted her in 1851, and that her son, Gilbert B. Harvey, continued from that date up to the time of his death to contribute to, or, to state it fully, to actually support her, sending her money and providing for her while he was in the Army. She was then old, and is now very old, perhaps 80 years of age, and in absolute need.

The Commissioner of Pensions rejected her claim on the ground that her son was not in the military service at the time he received the wound which resulted in his death. This ruling was perhaps right under the facts and law as interpreted by the Pension Bureau, and therefore relief is sought through a special act of Congress.

But, however this may be, the proof is clear that he was on duty and acting in obedience to the immediate orders of General Rousseau in an engagement with the enemy near Nashville when he was shot; that the military authorities recognized his character as a soldier and an officer by taking him to the officers' hospital, having him treated and cared for until he died, in about one month afterward; and the United States authorities emphasized this recognition when they buried him as a soldier, and afterward reinterred him in the national cemetery at Chattanooga, Tenn. He had served well and faithfully previous to the battle in which he lost his life. He was strictly in the line of duty when wounded.

Your committee therefore report back bill H. R. 1491, and recommend that the same do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MILLIA STAPLES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1504) for the relief of Millia Staples.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the rolls of the Pension Office the name of Millia Staples, of Morgan County, Tennessee, for and on account of services rendered the United States by Benjamin T. Staples, who was killed while in line of duty as first lieutenant and adjutant of the Eleventh Regiment Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers, on March 22, 1863.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill 1504 for the relief of Millia Staples, have had the same under consideration, and report it back with the recommendation that it do pass.

Benjamin T. Staples was appointed adjutant of the First Tennessee Cavalry in March, 1863, at the commencement of recruiting and organizing said regiment. Andrew Johnson, then military governor of Tennessee, authorized R. A. Davis to recruit and raise said regiment and commissioned him as lieutenant-colonel, and Lieut. Col. R. A. Davis, after personal consultation with Governor Johnson, appointed said Staples adjutant, as aforesaid, with the rank of first lieutenant. Lieut. Col. R. A. Davis, and Lieutenant and Adjutant Benjamin T. Staples and other members of said regiment left Somerset, Ky., previous to the 18th day of March, 1863, for the purpose of proceeding to the border counties of Tennessee in order to meet refugees coming out of the confederate into the Union lines and enlisting them in the military service, and thus completing the maximum of said regiment.

On or about the 18th day of March, 1863, when said recruiting squad was halted at a place called Pine Knob, near the Tennessee line, they were attacked by a portion of Pegram's forces, and said Staples was wounded and taken prisoner. Others were killed, including the major of said regiment.

The testimony, which is thoroughly reliable, shows that—

"After his capture said Staples was conveyed to Monticello, Ky., and was started from there under charge of a portion of the notorious Champe Ferguson's guerrilla command, ostensibly for Knoxville, Tenn., a prisoner; but when a few miles from Monticello, and on or about the 22d day of March, 1863, said Staples was shot and killed by said command. Affiant further states that at the time said Staples was wounded and captured he was discharging his duty under the appointment of adjutant that he had received."

This is from the affidavit of Lieut. Col. R. A. Davis, who had given said Staples the appointment of adjutant by the advice and approval of the military governor, Andrew Johnson.

The proof shows Lieutenant-Colonel Davis to have been present and wounded, but escaped, and afterward completed the organization of his regimant and served with distinction. Although appointed as aforesaid, the said Benjamin T. Staples had not been mustered and thus enrolled as adjutant. And it seems that on the final completion and organization of said Eleventh Tennessee Cavalry no notice was taken of the previous appointment of said Staples to the adjutancy of said regiment, and there is no record of his appointment and service. Therefore his widow has never applied to the Commissioner of Pensions, but now asks Congress to recognize the services and death of her husband by placing her on the pension-roll as the widow of a first lieutenant of cavalry volunteers. Said Staples was a prominent Union leader in East Tennessee, and rendered much valuable service to the Union cause and to the Union Army before he entered the military service of the Government. His widow is now old and needs pecuniary assistance, which your committee are of opinion should be granted by the passage of the bill herein recommended.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

VIOLET CALLOWAY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 297) granting a pension to Violet Calloway.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Violet Calloway, widow of James Calloway, who served under General William Henry Harrison in the war of 1811 and 1812, on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and restrictions of the pension laws.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 297) granting a pension to Violet Calloway, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report:

That the evidence on file shows that James Calloway, the husband of claimant, served in Capt. Andrew Wilkins's company of Indiana militia from September 18, 1811, to November 18, 1811; that he took part in the bloody battle of Tippecanoe. These facts appear from the official report of the Adjutant-General of the Army.

Claimant's husband made application for pension under act of 1871, granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, but the claim was rejected because not covered by that law, the services having been rendered prior to the declaration of war.

There is no proof of the death of James Calloway, and of identification of claimant as his widow, but your committee have ascertained from Hon. THOMAS R. COBB, who introduced the bill for the relief of claimant, that he knows of his own personal knowledge that such are the facts.

Your committee are of opinion that the relief asked should be granted, and they therefore report the bill back with the recommendation that it pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JULIA A. ROSS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5259) granting a pension to Julia A. Ross.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Julia A. Ross, widow of Michael M. Ross, late a private in Company I, First United States Artillery, and who died in said service August 10, 1852.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition for the pensioning of Julia A. Ross, submit the following report:

Your committee, having considered said petition, would respectfully recommend that the accompanying bill do pass.

Mr. CRISP. As no information about the facts in this case are given in the report, I should like to hear some explanation.

Mr. MATSON. This report comes from the Committee on Pensions, not the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The gentleman who made the report, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. YORK], is in his seat. I may say, however, that I reported this bill in the last Congress, and am in a position to state some of the facts, but perhaps the gentleman who has reported it this session can state them better than I can. I remember the case very well.

Mr. YORK. I reported this bill at the request of the Committee on Pensions. The claim was thoroughly examined and we found it to be worthy. I have all the proofs among the papers in my desk, but not thinking the bill was to come up just now I do not have them at my hand. I will say, however, the claim was thoroughly examined by the Committee on Pensions and acted upon favorably. We think it a just claim, and I cheerfully indorse the passage of the bill.

Mr. CRISP. I wish to inquire why under the general law this pension can not be allowed? What are the special facts in the case?

Mr. MATSON. As I have said, I remember the case very well and I remember the claimant. Her husband was for a long time, during almost his whole life, a soldier in the regular Army, and he died a soldier in the regular Army just before the war broke out. At that time no pension was given to soldiers who died in the service; and that is the reason the claimant comes to Congress. She had been the wife of this soldier during the greater portion of his service. He had served on the frontier and elsewhere.

Mr. STEELE. He served in the war with Mexico, and the claimant was there with him and served as a nurse.

Mr. MATSON. Yes; I had forgotten that circumstance. From the examination I gave it I was satisfied it was a very meritorious case. But because the claim did not arise out of the last war, it could not be granted in the regular course. The bill was referred to our committee in this Congress, but we brought it back and had it referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. YORK. I think every member of the Committee on Pensions thoroughly indorsed this claim. Owing to the rush of business I had not an opportunity of making out a full report as I had intended. But I will state that I have the fullest confidence in the claim as a worthy one.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I see no law or authority in virtue of which this claim can be sustained. As I understand it, the husband of this good woman was in the regular service. That was his occupation and his calling, and I should like to know by what law or under what authority his widow is entitled to a pension?

Mr. RAY, of New York. I will state to the gentleman that the committee want to make a law giving this woman a pension because there is not one. If there was a law giving a pension in such a case it would not be necessary to make an application to Congress.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Then they should show a meritorious case.

Mr. RAY, of New York. They do so.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. What is it? So far as I know it has not been stated. Has the gentleman from New York heard it? What he tells me I knew before he rose. No information has been given to justify this claim.

Mr. YORK. I will say to my colleague from North Carolina that the case was thoroughly examined by the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. But I wish to know upon what ground the pension is recommended? Is it simply because she is the widow of a soldier who died before the war?

Mr. YORK. The pension is recommended because of the gallant acts of her husband in the Army.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. What were those acts?

Mr. STEELE. He died in the service from the result of diseases contracted in the service.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. And there is no law to pension his widow?

Mr. STEELE. No, sir. There is no law to pension her.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN ROBBINS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 254) granting a pension to John Robbins, reported with an amendment from the Committee on Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Robbins, late a private in Company A, Second Illinois Volunteers (Mexican war) at the rate of $24 per month.

The amendment was to add to the bill the following:

The same to be in lieu of any pension now received.

The report (by Mr. LAIRD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 254) granting a pension to John Robbins, having had the same under consideration, respectfully submit the following:

The committee find from the evidence submitted that John Robbins was a private soldier in Company A, Second Regiment of Illinois Volunteers, in the war with Mexico, and that while in the line of his duty at the battle of Buena Vista received a gunshot wound in his left hip, where the ball now remains imbedded; that for this injury Robbins has received a pension at the rate of from four to eight dollars per month from the 7th day of November, 1853, to the present date, the rate of allowance now being $4 per month. It further appears by the affidavit of Robbins and two of his comrades that at Marcelena, Mexico, claimant had a severe attack of mumps, from the effects of which he has never recovered. The proof shows that from wounds and other injuries Robbins is now totally disabled and without means of support. The committee therefore report in favor of the passage of the bill herewith returned.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MRS. M. C. JONES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 394) granting a pension to Mrs. M. C. Jones, reported with amendments from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. M. C. Jones, widow of Dr. T. M. Jones, late surgeon of the One hundred and thirtieth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws. This act to take effect from and after its passage.

The amendments were to make the bill read, "to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Mary C. Jones, widow of Dr. Thomas M. Jones," &c.; also, to amend the title so as to read, "A bill granting a pension to Mrs. Mary C. Jones."

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 394) granting a pension to Mrs. M. C. Jones, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

Thomas N. Jones was a physician, and practiced as such for many years prior to the last war. In 1861 he entered the service as assistant surgeon of the Second Indiana Cavalry, and served as such for about one year. He re-entered the service as surgeon of the One hundred and thirtieth Indiana Volunteers, and served in that capacity from March, 1864, to July 19 of the same year. During this service his regiment was actively engaged in the Atlanta campaign. He died October 21, 1875. His widow, Mary C. Jones, filed an application for a pension on account of his death August 4, 1879. This was rejected upon the ground that there was a record in the War Department showing that the disease of which he died existed prior to his service in either of the above regiments.

The adverse record consists of a certificate of a board of officers before whom he was examined at the time he resigned his last service, and this certificate states that he was subject "to asthma from childhood, and to rheumatism for fifteen or twenty years, for last few years only in chronic form, and is never free from it." He died of these two diseases, and the question for this committee to decide upon the evidence before it is whether these existed prior to his last service in the Army. The decision of the Pension Office was made upon the record alone. Although a special examination was had at the home of the claimant, and at the place where the soldier had lived for many years prior to the war, the officer who conducted said examination was obliged to report to the office that he could not find any one who had any knowledge of the existence of these diseases prior to his entering the last service he performed for the Government, and in his report recommended the allowance of the widow's claim.

More than twenty reputable witnesses, six of them physicians who knew him intimately for a long time prior to the war, testify positively to his robust health up to the time he entered the service, in the year 1864. All of these witnesses speak of him from a long and intimate acquaintance, and concur in the fact that he was a remarkably strong man and in excellent health until he entered the service as surgeon aforesaid. The testimony is all that way, and, in a word, is as strong as it could be made. No one speaks to the contrary. The fact that such a record was made at the time he left the service is, at least to some extent, explained by the fact that he was then in very poor health and had been for two months, and was determined to get out of the Army, as he believed it was necessary to save his life. And it is further explained by conversation which he had with an old acquaintance, Hon. Milton S. Robinson, a member of the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses, and who was then lieutenant-colonel of the Forty-seventh Indiana Volunteers, a day or two previous to his resignation from his first service, in which he stated that to get out of the service he would make any statement that was necessary. This was doubtless the case when the adverse record was made against him. Having been sick for some time, and being anxious to get out of the service, he stated to the board of officers who examined him, and who were evidently strangers to him, such things as he thought would make it certain that his resignation would be accepted.

The case is overwhelmingly proven, and but for the unyielding rule of the Pension Office, prescribed by a decision of the Secretary of the Interior in 1880, that parol testimony can not be admitted to contradict an adverse record, after a lapse of years this case would have been admitted, and the widow would have been pensioned from the death of her husband. This committee is of the opinion that the action of the office in this case should have been favorable, and would have been but for the iron rule of the Department, which controls the Commissioner of Pensions.

We therefore recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendments: Insert the word "Mary" instead of the letter "M." and the words "Thomas N." instead of "T. M.," in line 5 of said bill, and that the title be amended by inserting the word "Mary" instead of the initial "M."

The question was upon agreeing to the amendments reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. CRISP. I do not know that anything I can say will affect members of this Committee of the Whole in their action on this bill. I desire, however, to put on record my objection to the granting of pensions in such cases as this.

I understand the Committee on Invalid Pensions in their report to say that they presume this gentleman would have made any statement whatever in order to get out of the Army. I will not do his memory, dead as he is, the injustice to say any such thing, and I do not think the committee ought to have said it. Yet it seems from this report that this gentleman at the time he sought to get out of the Army stated that he suffered with rheumatism and with asthma, and he was discharged.

He lived perhaps ten years after his discharge, and his widow applied through the regular channel for a pension. She was met in the Department with the record that her husband had made. It is conceded that he died with asthma and rheumatism; that is admitted. When his widow applied for a pension she was met with the record in the Department of the statement made by her husband himself, as I understand the report, that he had been subject to asthma from childhood and to rheumatism for fifteen or twenty years. That statement was made by him at the time he sought his discharge.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions report that it is probable that he would have made any statement in his great anxiety to get out of the Army, whether such statement was consistent with the truth or not. These are plain words, but that is exactly what it amounts to. The testimony of his neighbors, of people who know him, is produced to show that he did not suffer from rheumatism and asthma. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, and I ask the gentlemen of this committee, who would have more knowledge on the question of what a man suffers than the man himself? How many men are there of your acquaintance who suffer perhaps almost every day from some disease, affliction, or pain, and never give utterance to it? There may be many such cases.

I take it that when this gentleman made the statement he did he told the truth. And I object, for one, to a committee of this House or to any one, on the statement of other people, after a man has been buried and his mouth is closed forever, coming in here and saying that the probability is he would have made any statement to accomplish his purpose, to wit, to get out of the Army. That is a reflection on his memory, and this good lady, his widow, ought not, in my humble judgment, to seek a pension when to secure it it is necessary to make such a statement as that.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I would ask the gentleman how it becomes necessary that she should contradict the record which her husband has made in order to get a pension?

Mr. CRISP. As I understand the case from the reading of the report, when the widow applied through the regular channel for a pension she was met with a record in the Department of the statement made by her husband at the time he was discharged—the statement on his part that he had long been suffering from rheumatism and asthma.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Before he went into the service?

Mr. CRISP. Yes, long before he went into the service; for fifteen years.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I did not so understand it.

Mr. CRISP. The record shows that the man did die of asthma and rheumatism. As I understand it, it is essential under the rules established by the committee, and I have no doubt they investigate all cases fairly, that a reasonable probability shall be shown that the person incurred in the service the disease from which he died. Now, in order to bring this case within that rule it is necessary to show that the statement he made at the time he was discharged was not true; that is the way I understand the case.

That being so, I merely want to enter my protest against any such finding as that, and to say for myself, feeling as I believe I can say with frankness and candor I do feel an interest in those who have offered their lives in the service and defense of their country, notwithstanding I was on the other side; and feeling an interest in the honor of the country, I protest for one against any such finding as that being put on record here in order to justify the granting of a pension in this case.

I will say for myself that in every case where a person has been discharged from the Army on his own statement that the disease from which he was suffering, and of which he finally died, existed prior to his enlistment, I will not vote to grant a pension to him. I will not vote to grant a pension in any case where the death resulted from a disease which the person had contracted before he went into the Army.

Mr. MATSON. In order to relieve the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and particularly myself, from the imputation which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] has cast upon this report, I will say the committee has not stated that this officer at the time he was discharged said what was not true. But we do say that he did state to Hon. Milton S. Robinson, who was at that time lieutenant-colonel of the Forty-seventh Indiana Volunteers and subsequently a member of the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses, that he (Jones) would make any statement which was necessary in order to secure his discharge from the service. We simply say that he had so stated to Mr. Robinson.

Mr. CRISP. Of course I do not wish to do injustice to any one; but I think the gentleman, if he will look again at the report, will find the committee say that in their judgment this man would have stated anything to obtain his discharge.

Mr. MATSON. I think not. What the committee say is that this man had so stated to Mr. Robinson. The report then proceeds:

> Having been sick for some time, and being anxious to get out of the service, he stated to the board of officers who examined him, and who were evidently strangers to him, such things as he thought would make it certain that his resignation would be accepted.

We do not pretend to say whether these things were true or untrue.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are two sides to this question. When the Government accepts a man into its service it thereby declares him to be sound and free from disabilities; and I have always believed that the Government, after receiving a man into its service, is estopped from setting up a prior unsoundness. I can not see any other equitable rule.

But this case does not stop there. This report states the fact that a special examiner who was sent by the Pension Office to two different places where the man had lived investigated the question of his health during his whole life, and was not able to find a single man who would say that Jones had had any disability at all; but, on the contrary, among more than twenty witnesses, six of them physicians who had known him intimately (I remember I counted the number of witnesses examined by this special examiner until I was tired), no single one pretended to say anything else than that this man was a man of excellent health and particularly robust before entering the service.

Now, I am glad my friend from Georgia has suggested that the Committee on Invalid Pensions ought to act upon probabilities. What are the probabilities in this case? Is it more probable that twenty very reputable men would come before an officer authorized to administer oaths and commit perjury upon the question of this man's physical condition before entering the service, upon the question of his being free from these particular diseases—because the inquiries were directed especially to them—is it more probable that more than twenty men who swear positively upon this proposition give false testimony than that this poor man, sick as he was and had been prior to going before this board, anxious as he was to get home where he might have the care of his family, should make a statement that was perhaps too strong in order to get out of the service?

Where are the probabilities? My friend from Georgia if he had been called upon to decide this case would have decided it as the Committee on Invalid Pensions decided it—upon the probabilities. We can not ascertain perhaps with absolute certainty the real facts in any case; and, as my friend says, we ought to be governed by probabilities in determining these cases. I think it must be apparent to this House that our conclusion in this case was made more than probable by the direct testimony of more than twenty good men and good women, six of these witnesses being physicians who had been intimately connected with this man, and who swore distinctly and emphatically to the fact that he was free from these particular diseases before he enlisted.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I wish only to place myself right upon this matter. I want the Committee of the Whole to see that I was correct in the statement I made as to the report of the committee in this case.

At the time of the discharge of this gentleman from the Army, the certificate states that he had been "subject from childhood to asthma, and to rheumatism for fifteen or twenty years, for the last few years only in chronic form, and is never free from it." That is the record made up at the time this gentleman obtained his discharge—"asthma from childhood and rheumatism for fifteen or twenty years." He was on this ground discharged, and he died of asthma and rheumatism.

Now, what explanation does the committee attempt to give of that part of this gentleman's record? The committee says:

> The fact that such a record was made at the time he left the service is, at least to some extent, explained by the fact that he was then in very poor health, and had been for two months, and was determined to get out of the Army, as he believed it was necessary to save his life.

What does the committee mean by this, if it does not mean to affirm that this gentleman when making this statement said probably what was not true?

Mr. MATSON. I said, and still insist, we have not said that this gentleman stated these things; but we think it likely he did. We do not say that he did; that was the point I was attempting to make. We do not say he made that statement; but I think it likely he did. I will say that to the gentleman.

Mr. CRISP. Well, Mr. Chairman, that brings me to the proposition which, I submit, ought to be an insuperable barrier to the obtaining of a pension by this man during his life or by his widow after his death.

Mr. RAY, of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRISP. With pleasure.

Mr. RAY, of New York. If the committee believe, from the evidence, that if this man did make this statement it was untrue; if they believe that he never had had asthma or rheumatism up to the time he entered the service; if they believe he did contract these diseases in the service and in the line of his duty, then would the gentleman say that his widow and his orphan children, if any, should be deprived of a pension because the man, in his anxiety to get out of the service, had made a misstatement?

Mr. CRISP. Careful as we should be of the honor of a man who is dead, I should say that if this man lived for ten years after his discharge and never applied to a generous government for a pension, and if he made a statement when he was discharged that he had suffered from these diseases from childhood, I should say that the widow is estopped, and that this House ought to be estopped, from saying on the testimony of others that his statements at that time were untrue.

Why, Mr. Chairman, there is no such thing as the matter of perjury that my friend from Indiana talks about.

Mr. MATSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Georgia, as to the question of estoppel, whether he does not think it ought to go back to the time of his enlistment and prevent the Government that accepted his services from setting up the plea that he was disabled at the time his services were accepted.

Mr. CRISP. I am not familiar with the rules that existed in operation here at that time, but if I know anything from the history of the past it is that at the time this gentleman enlisted no very special physical examination was made of men who offered themselves in defense of their country. They might be maimed and halt, but if they came up to offer their services to their country they were accepted. But by acceptance there was no admission like there is to-day in time of peace that a man is physically perfect.

Now, as to the question of perjury, Mr. Chairman, it is unnecessary to impute perjury to any one. How are these friends and neighbors to know that this gentleman's statement is true? Does the gentleman from Indiana know now whether I suffer from asthma? Are there not gentlemen living in the town where he resides who may apparently be in as good health as I am, and yet he does not know what they suffer? That is a matter peculiarly within the knowledge of the sufferer?

I enter my protest against finding against that fact when stated by him after his mouth is closed in death, after he lived ten years and never appealed to this generous country, which was granting pensions to all its defenders who had suffered from disease in the service. Is not that fact to be considered that he did not apply, and that after his death this record is assailed; and the only way it can be assailed, in my humble judgment, is at least by charging that the probabilities are this dead man had made a false statement; that is all. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word or two before this goes to a vote. If this man's lips are sealed in death and his widow and children are appealing to a generous country, I think it ill becomes a patriotic Congress to call upon the technical rule of estoppel to close their mouths from their just rights.

My friend from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], I see from his record, is a distinguished lawyer in his State, having represented the Commonwealth, I believe, as public prosecutor or judge.

Mr. CRISP. Both.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Then he knows well that the law does not favor the application of estoppel as a rule. It is one of the technical rules like the statute of limitations, and if it is to be invoked in this case, I submit to my generous friend, who I see fought gallantly in the confederate service against this gentleman who he says has had his lips sealed in death—I appeal to him that the law of estoppel, in the language of my gallant friend the chairman of the committee, should apply to the Government, who said he was sound enough to draw his sword and defend that Government. That is more in consonance with my feelings.

I will not impute any other motive than the loftiest to my friend, although I confess in a former session of this House it pained me when the chairman of the committee asked what objections he had to a bill when he called a quorum in this House, and he turned around and pointed to the clock, which was half past 9, and said that was his objection. Are his objections to this bill loftier than those which made him point to the clock at half past 9, when he would not let us go ahead with these pension bills for these poor fellows? I have never seen or heard of anything which struck me with so much astonishment as that act, and I was glad to see that my associates on this floor on both sides of the House were equally struck with astonishment. I believe here and now there will be no distinction in recognizing what is just and due this poor woman and her children.

The law of estoppel is invoked in this case because for a number of years no appeal was made to a generous government. Why, I can say to my good friend from Georgia (and let him not interpret anything I may say other than with the kindliest feelings) that there is many a noble and generous man who has gone down to the grave from causes arising in the time of war when he did not know in the first instance the cause lay back there, or, in the second instance, was too modest to assert his claim. If he did not, should not the widow and child do it?

I have discussed this question, Mr. Chairman, more at length than I like or intended to do, but it involves a principle, and that principle is this law of estoppel. I believe the gentleman from Indiana, the chairman of the committee, has stated a proposition that should call upon every member of the American Congress to cast his vote in favor of this bill. He has stated a principle that should govern in dealing with such cases; and I say that when this Republic examined the man, as we were examined by the ablest surgeons, from head to foot, and declared sound enough to carry a musket, it does not lie in the mouth of a great government like this when the widow and children come in and ask for what is due to them for the death of that man, to say, "Ah, you are estopped from making that request because he was unsound at the time of his enlistment, at the time he entered the service." I say, sir, that the Government should be estopped from setting up such a plea.

Mr. BLANCHARD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Yes; with great pleasure.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Was this examination to which the gentleman has just alluded as having been made of all soldiers prior to their enlistment applicable also to surgeons as well as to the soldiers who are to serve regularly as such in the ranks?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Applicable to surgeons, you ask?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I can not say that it does. But that is not pertinent to this question, because the same rule applies to every man that the Government accepts as being able to perform and qualified to discharge the duties that are assigned to him, whether he be examined or not.

Mr. BLANCHARD. But you said, as I understood you, a few moments ago, that when an application was made for enlistment there was an examination of the applicant from head to foot. Now, I desire to know whether that examination applied also to those who sought to perform service in the Army as surgeons?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The question of the gentleman has no possible application to the pending question. But my statement was that when a man applied for enlistment he was examined from head to foot. The Government sought to determine whether or not he was able to fight, to carry a musket, and to perform the duties of a soldier. Now surgeons, as I understand it, are commissioned officers, and were not, perhaps, subjected to a personal physical examination. But if the Government accepted their services I claim that the same rule would apply as should apply in the case of private soldiers who were examined before their acceptance. They were subjected to a strict examination. But furthermore to my friend from Louisiana let me say that in my judgment that man who knew himself to have some disease, but was willing to lay that fact aside and still go into his country's service, deserves even greater credit, and the application of his wife and child for a pension should be rewarded and considered accordingly.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I think that every question of this or any other kind should be decided, not upon the sentiment which is attempted to be invoked by my friend from Iowa, but by the facts and the equities which are presented in each case. I agree with the criticisms which have been made upon this report by my friend from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

It appears from this report that this gentleman in 1861 entered the service of the United States as an assistant surgeon of an Indiana regiment of cavalry. He served in that capacity for about one year, and at the end of that time he seems to have retired from the service for a period. Later on he appears to have re-entered the service as surgeon of the One hundred and thirtieth Indiana Volunteers, and he served there from March, 1864, until July 19 of that year, or less than five months. Now, at the end of that second period of service, or after five months, he appears to have been exceedingly anxious to retire from the Army a second time, and in order that he might retire from the Army the second time he applied for his discharge upon the ground of physical disability.

To test the truth of this allegation as to his condition of physical disability what was done? He is not merely discharged upon his own personal allegation of his physical condition—by no means. On the contrary, it appears that a board of officers was called together to test the truth of his allegation. That board of officers met and considered his case, and it is safe to affirm that they not only had his own statement of his physical inability to serve further, but that they had further and additional evidence as to the physical condition of this man. The evidence taken by that board of officers seems to have satisfied them that he was not only physically disabled to perform service, but that that physical disability resulted not from service in the Army, but dated back to a time long anterior to his entrance into the service the first time.

Mr. MATSON. Let me interrupt the gentleman there?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Certainly.

Mr. MATSON. Where do you get the evidence that this board had any other evidence than the statement of the applicant?

Mr. BLANCHARD. The gentleman mistakes me; I did not so allege. But I say it is reasonable to presume that they did not merely take the word of this man himself, who was seeking to obtain a discharge from the Army. He was an interested party; and I repeat it is safe to affirm that they did not merely take his word as to his physical condition and his inability to remain longer in the service. It is only a fair presumption that they went further and tested the truth of that allegation. And I find from this very report, which I desire to say is as favorable as circumstances would permit to this party, that this board of officers sat upon this case, and they recommended his discharge from the Army on account of this physical disability; but they further found, sir, that that disability existed prior to his entrance into the Army.

Mr. MATSON. I desire to say for the information of the gentleman from Louisiana, if he will permit me——

Mr. BLANCHARD. Certainly.

Mr. MATSON. That in cases of this kind, as all those who were in the Army will remember, there was no such thing as a judicial investigation; it was a mere physical examination. This board was composed of one surgeon and two other officers. They were not all surgeons. It was a mere physical survey of the man, and in such cases no testimony was taken.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am not familiar, Mr. Chairman, never having been in any army, with the mode of procedure in the case of the application of the soldier in the Army for his discharge. But I take the facts as I find them in this report. I find that this board of officers recommended the discharge of Dr. Jones because he had asthma and rheumatism, and they said in their award that he had had these diseases for fifteen or twenty years, and for the last few years in a chronic form.

Now, sir, the side of the opposition in a case of this kind, I am aware, is the unpopular side. Gentlemen get up as my friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] did and appeal to us to vote this pension in the interests of a widow and children. That, sir, is a strong appeal to the sentiment of a man; every one of us has in his heart that sentiment. But I say we are sitting here legislating in the interest of the people of this country. I say the money which is to be applied to the payment of this pension, if it be allowed, belongs to the people of the United States, and we as their representatives have no right upon the ground of mere sentiment to vote one single cent of that money away. We must view every question of this kind when it is brought before us upon the basis of the facts and the equities of the case. If those facts and those equities as they exist entitle this woman to this pension, then I say she ought to have it; but I say if there be a reasonable doubt that the facts and the equities of the case warrant this pension, then, sir, that doubt should be resolved in favor of keeping this money in the Treasury where it belongs, and from which we have no right to draw it except in a case where the facts are so plain and the equities so strong that it is irresistible.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I want to ask my friend from Louisiana if he does not feel that the equities applying to the widows and children of the men who not altogether sound went into the service should not be considered with as much at least of that broad generosity and kind philanthropy that appealed to all our hearts and to mine when we voted so cordially for aid to those who were suffering along the banks of the great Mississippi River? I am in favor of sentiment, I want to say to my friend from Louisiana, and that sentiment will extend to his district in Louisiana as well as to the widows and children of my fellow-soldiers.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I did not yield to the gentleman for an argument. And I say if this pension is asked for on the ground of charity, as the $500,000 was asked for which this House appropriated for the relief of the sufferers along the Ohio River, then I for one might be willing to vote for it. But I do not understand that this case is presented in the aspect of a charitable one.

Mr. MATSON. If the gentleman from Louisiana wishes to know the fact, I can state to him the widow now is in absolute need.

Mr. BLANCHARD. That may be, Mr. Chairman, but nowhere in this report is it affirmed that this is a case in which charity ought to be exercised. On the contrary, sir, this report sets forth certain facts as established by the evidence submitted to the committee, and from those facts they deduce the conclusion that this is a just case, in which the Congress of the United States ought to grant a pension.

It appears further from this report that this gentleman lived for eleven years after his discharge from the Army, and in all that time, notwithstanding the fact that thousands upon thousands of soldiers were applying for pensions, he did not see fit to enter his application at the Pension Office. And it is reserved until he dies for this application to be made for the first time. Now, sir, if this gentleman had contracted this rheumatism and this asthma in the service, as it is alleged in this report that he did, why is it that he did not, eleven years before his death and after the war closed, apply in person for a pension? These facts in my mind make out a case in which I believe the relief asked for should not be granted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment submitted by the committee.

Mr. CRISP. I want to say a word or two. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], while stating that he did not propose to question my motives in making the point the other night that no quorum had voted, went on to use language that is inconsistent with any other idea than that he does arrogate to himself the right to question my motives. It is one thing, Mr. Chairman, to say that you will not do a thing and it is another to act in accordance with that statement. I say to the gentleman from Iowa, if he can derive any consolation from that, that so long as I have the honor to occupy a seat upon this floor I shall be governed by my own convictions of what is right, and I shall not advise with him before I act.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. That advice will never be tendered, you may depend upon it.

Mr. CRISP. It shall not be sought, and if it is tendered it will be gratuitous; it is not wanted. One word further, I have been here at every night session we have had. You see who are here.

The Constitution of the country, which we have sworn to support, provides that a majority of the members composing this House shall constitute a quorum for purposes of legislation. We are here every Friday night, voting hundreds and thousands of dollars from the Treasury, for meritorious purposes it may be; but the Constitution does not say that less than a quorum can vote money from the Treasury for any purpose.

After spending two hours here in that way, am I to be criticised because at one of these night sessions I asked that such legislation should cease? That was all I did. I moved that the committee rise in order that the House should adjourn. I believed that by 10 o'clock the House would have acted upon all the bills which the Committee of the Whole had considered, and I moved that the committee rise. The motion was not carried. When the next case came up I made the point that no quorum voted upon it, and when my friend from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] asked me to allow that bill to be laid aside to be reported to the House, I said that was not my object; the object that I had in view was to have the House adjourn. The committee did rise then, and the House adjourned by 10 o'clock. Am I to be censured for that?

Where are the members of this House now? Are there seventy-five members here to night? Every Friday night some of us come here and attempt to do our duty by legislating in the interests of the soldiers of the country. When we see proper in the exercise of our own sense of duty to take steps looking to an adjournment the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] criticises the motives which actuate us. I say that it is ungraceful in him to do so. I say that it does not become him to do so. Night after night, whenever a night session is held here, I have come here to attend to the business of the country. That is all I care to say now.

The amendments reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions were then agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

DR. SAMUEL DAVIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4368) granting an increase of pension to Dr. Samuel Davis, reported with an amendment from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Dr. Samuel Davis, late surgeon of the Eighty-third Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, to $50.25 per month.

The amendment was, to strike out "$50.25" and to insert in lieu thereof "$40," as the rate of pension per month.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4368) granting an increase of pension to Dr. Samuel Davis, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

This pensioner was first granted a pension in 1864 on account of injuries to his spine, resulting from the upsetting of an ambulance loaded with sick soldiers and under the charge of the pensioner, who was then the surgeon of the Eighty-third Indiana Volunteers. He is now over 70 years of age, and has been pensioned according to the disability found to exist since the date of his resignation; until recently he has shown that he is growing worse rapidly and has for some time been in a helpless condition from his injuries received as aforesaid, but not so helpless as to require the regular or constant aid and attendance of another person all the time. This, however, is his condition a greater part of the time.

He is now drawing $31.25 per month, and there is no rate fixed by law between that sum and the sum of $50 per month allowed to those who require the regular aid and attendance of another person. The examining surgeon of the Pension Bureau, who last examined him, recommends that he be rated at $40 per month, and the committee concur therein, and therefore ask that said bill be passed with the following amendment: Strike out the words "fifty dollars and twenty-five cents," and insert the words "forty dollars" instead thereof.

The question was upon agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. MATSON. This bill is like one which was discussed two weeks ago to-night, when a controversy arose between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] and myself. That gentleman is not here to-night, but as this is the first opportunity I have had to say so, I desire to say that upon one branch of the proposition which he and I had an amicable dispute about he was right and I was wrong. The law fixes a specific rate of pension for those who have lost both arms, both feet, or both eyes, a pension of $72 per month. All other persons, no matter how helpless they may be from other causes, can receive no higher pension than $50 per month. He was therefore right in one aspect of the case and I was wrong, and I was right in another.

The amendment reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions was agreed to.

The bill as amended was then laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

AMANDA E. HOYT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3603) granting a pension to Amanda E. Hoyt, reported adversely from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was read, as follows.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Amanda E. Hoyt, widow of William M. Hoyt, deceased, late a private in Company I, One hundred and first Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, who was receiving a pension at the rate of $8 per month until the 27th day of August, 1883, at which time, while in the employ of the United States as a postal clerk in the railway mail service, on the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati and Saint Louis Railroad, he was killed in a wreck at Mingo Junction, in the State of Ohio; and that the said Amanda E. Hoyt be paid at the rate of $8 per month from and after the said 27th day of August, 1883.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3603) granting a pension to Amanda E. Hoyt, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

William M. Hoyt, late of Company I, One hundred and first Ohio Volunteers, was pensioned on account of a disease of his throat and lungs, and at the time of his death was drawing a pension of $8 per month on account thereof.

On the 27th day of August, 1883, while in the employ of the United States as a postal clerk in the railway mail service on the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati and Saint Louis Railroad, he was killed in a wreck at Mingo Junction, in the State of Ohio.

It is not claimed that the death cause was in the remotest degree connected with the disease for which he was pensioned, but it is urged that because he was killed while in the civil employment of the United States his widow should be pensioned, he having been a pensioner on account of military services. This committee is unable to give its assent to that proposition, believing as we do that it would furnish a precedent for the granting of pensions on account of civil services to the Government. This committee has been very liberal in the matter of settling questions of the death cause in favor of widows and dependent parents when it could be shown to relate in a slight degree to the disability incurred in the military service. But in this case there is no pretense of that, and we therefore feel compelled to report back said bill with an adverse recommendation; and upon the request of the author of the bill we ask that it be placed upon the Private Calendar for the action of the House.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. From the reading of the report the Committee of the Whole might infer that this pension was asked to be continued to the widow because her husband was killed while in the civil employment of the Government. That is not the case. That is a mere accident, because if he had been a mere passenger at the time the railroad accident occurred the same application would have been made.

This man was a soldier in the late war, and while in the service contracted lung disease, for which the Pension Office allowed him a pension of $8 per month. He was drawing that pension up to the 27th day of August, 1883, when this accident occurred. It is true that he was in the civil employment of the Government at the time of the accident that caused his death. While the train from Pittsburgh to Indianapolis, which was his route, was at Mingo Junction, in Ohio, it collided with another train, and he was so bruised and mangled that he died within a very few hours.

If he had died from the disease for which he was drawing a pension, the Pension Office would have continued it to the widow. But he died in consequence of this wreck of the train, and therefore could not have died from the disease for which he was drawing a pension. I introduced the bill for the relief of his widow, believing at the time, as I believe now, that his pension ought to be continued to her.

I have not observed any general rule by which the Committee on Invalid Pensions or this House has been governed in the allowance of pension claims, unless it be the one rule that no arrears of pension should be allowed. I believe that every case appeals to the sound judgment and discretion of the House. It is because of no general law covering the case that we come here and ask a special law to grant this pension.

I believe that this Committee of the Whole will agree with me that inasmuch as this man died under the circumstances stated in the report his pension of $8 a month should be continued to his widow. I had a slight acquaintance with this man and I have a slight acquaintance with his widow. I know the circumstances in which she was left by the death of her husband, but that is perhaps not material to this case.

I believe the granting of this pension to be an act of justice, and, having stated the facts, I submit the case to the Committee of the Whole, and ask that it will reverse the action of the Committee on Invalid Pensions and allow this bill to pass, with an amendment which I shall offer. The bill as drawn provides for the payment of the pension from and after the 27th day of August, 1883. I move, inasmuch as such has been the custom of the House for years past, and I think a wise one, to strike out the words "the said 27th day of August, 1883," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "the passage of this act." I hope the Committee of the Whole will pass the bill with that amendment.

Mr. MATSON. It is perhaps true, as stated by my colleague [Mr. PEELLE], that the Committee on Invalid Pensions has no general rule applicable without exception to every case; yet we have general rules by which we are governed. The question in this case is whether we should grant a pension to the widow of a soldier whose death can in no way be attributed to the service that he rendered the Government as a soldier.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. If this soldier had not been drawing a pension up to the time of his death I should quite agree with my colleague; but inasmuch as he was drawing a pension up to that time, I think there is a distinction in favor of this case.

Mr. MATSON. Still the naked fact remains that the cause of this man's death had no sort of connection with his military service. If he had been as strong as Samson he would have been killed in that railroad accident. His widow perhaps has a right of action against the railroad company, and it is likely will recover damages.

But, Mr. Chairman, I repeat that the question here is a very simple one: Shall a widow be pensioned in a case where her husband's death can in no way be attributed to his military service?

Mr. STEELE. If this man had made his run on the railroad successfully and had died that night from the disease for which he was drawing a pension, his widow would have drawn a pension under the general rule, because she was deprived of the assistance of her husband toward her support. Now, is she not just as much entitled to a pension when deprived of his assistance under the circumstances of the present case as she would have been if he had died of disease contracted in the service?

Mr. MATSON. By no means; for he might have recovered from the disability incurred in the service. It is impossible to say whether he would have died from that disability or would have recovered from it, and died perhaps from some other railroad accident.

Mr. STEELE. But if he had died from disease or disability incurred in the service she would have drawn a pension.

Mr. MATSON. Of course that proposition can not be controverted.

I know there is a growing sentiment in this country that the widows of all pensioners should continue to draw the pensions that their husbands drew. I do not concur in that proposition. I think there must be some end to this thing. We must draw the line somewhere. I know, too, that this proposition is strengthened a good deal by the consideration that in such cases the husband, by reason of the disease or disability incurred in the service, is less able to provide for the future support of his family. That is true. But whenever Congress agrees to a bill like this continuing the pension to the widow in a case where nobody pretends the cause of the death of the husband had any connection with his military service it takes a step in the direction of the general proposition I have suggested. If this widow is entitled to receive a pension, then widows of all pensioners are entitled to receive pensions, without reference to the cause of the death of the husband.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. Where the husband has been killed as this man was I should say that the widow would be entitled to receive the pension.

Mr. MATSON. I apprehend, so far as that is concerned, the manner of death could not make any difference—whether it be by disease or by accident. The woman is no more deprived of her husband's support by reason of the fact that he died in a railroad accident than if he had died on a languishing bed of disease.

Mr. VANCE. Why should not the widow have the benefit of the pension when the husband has been killed by accident? If he had lived the pension would have been drawn by him. He is dead; why should not the widow have the benefit of the pension?

Mr. MATSON. For the very reason that the husband, if he had not been killed by accident, might have recovered from the disease or disability on account of which he drew a pension. You can not tell whether he would have died from disease contracted in the Army or not; you do not know anything about it.

If you extend the pension in these cases to the widow, the next question will be, Why not to the children when the widow is gone? And if to the children, why not to the grandchildren? Where is this thing to stop? There is a great deal involved in this little bill as I look at it; for I repeat, if this widow is entitled to be pensioned upon this state of facts, then the widows of all pensioners are entitled to receive a pension without reference to the cause of the death of the husband.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, as I had the honor during the last Congress to serve with the gentleman from Indiana and others upon the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I wish to state as to the precedents in cases of this kind that while in the committee the question was frequently raised of granting pensions in cases somewhat similar to this, I undertake to say there can not be found a single report from any committee of any Congress that goes to the extent that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PEELLE] would have us go in this case.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. The gentleman refers to the granting of pensions to those on the civil list; and as to such cases I agree with him. But this is not such a case. This pension is asked on a different ground.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not care on what ground you place this case. The fact being that this man was killed in a railroad accident, that the cause of his death was not an injury received in the military service, I repeat my assertion that there is no precedent for a pension in a case of this kind, either in any act of Congress or even in the report of a committee. I defy the gentleman to find one. It can not be found, and the committee have reported properly here.

Now, the furthest any report has ever gone, as far as I have been able to learn, and I have examined the question with some care in other cases, is this: Where a man has been disabled in the military service and was afterward killed by accident, and that accident was brought about by his disability caused by his service, by his being crippled in the Army, then in one instance Congress has passed a bill to pension the party, and it was recommended by the committee, but at what rate of compensation I do not now remember. But in no instance has Congress granted a pension to a man who lost his life by a pure accident, and it will be a dark day when Congress does it.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the action of the Committee on Invalid Pensions will be sustained by this House. There is not a man who will look to the reports which have been made to the House by that committee who can truly say in one jot or tittle they have swerved from granting pensions. There has been no rigor applied, but on the contrary all doubts have been resolved in favor of the claimant.

But here is a case, Mr. Chairman, where Congress is asked to grant a pension—for what? For military service? No; but to grant a pension to a man who was killed in a railroad accident. Can Congress afford to do it?

Mr. STEELE. On what ground do you grant pensions to widows?

Mr. MCMILLIN. We grant pensions to widows on the ground of military service, for injury or disease contracted therein, and where the life of the party has been lost thereby. But in this case the life of the party has been lost by a railroad accident, and not from anything incurred in the military service.

Mr. STEELE. This man was in the military service and lost his life, and we propose to grant this pension because this widow is deprived of his support, upon which she was dependent, whether that life was lost by disease or accident.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The object of granting a pension is to give relief to those who have been injured in the military service, or after their death to those who have been dependent on them and have been deprived of their support. The gentleman fails to discriminate in this instance that there has been no deprivation resulting from military service. And that is the distinction which is to be drawn.

As stated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], this is an important question, and once you get beyond it you will have no power to stop. For when you say you will grant a pension simply because the husband of a widow was engaged in the military service and is now dead, you depart from the precedents established by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. STEELE. But take a case of this character, where a man is rendered helpless by wounds or disease in the military service, requiring the assistance of his wife, and gets $70 while he lives. If he dies, then she is deprived of that $70 a month, although his death may have been caused by disease or wounds in the service.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Where his death has been caused by his military service and his life has been sacrificed to his country it is an entirely different case. This man lost his life in a railroad accident.

Mr. STEELE. But his widow is deprived after that of his support, and of course of whatever pension he may have received during his lifetime.

Mr. MCMILLIN. You give your pension not simply upon the ground of wealth, because you would give to a pensioner who was worth a million of dollars a pension solely upon the ground that he deserved it because of his military services and by reason of his health having been lost, either directly or remotely, in serving his country. But that vital element in granting a pension is absolutely wanting in this case.

Mr. STEELE. But take the case of an officer in the Army, who during his lifetime gets anywhere from $100 to $200 a month; his widow as soon as he dies receives nothing. Now, does the gentleman from Tennessee think that is just, right, or equitable?

Mr. MCMILLIN. If the gentleman from Indiana wishes to switch me off and seeks an opinion from me, I will repeat what I have said over and over again upon the floor of this House, that the retired-list of the Army has been carried to a degree never warranted by any public exigency.

Mr. BAGLEY. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, a word in behalf of the Committee on Invalid Pensions and for its protection. It is, as you well know, a hard-worked committee, and I am a hard-worked member of it. I have a half-dozen instances at least of cases which have been referred to me for examination involving practically the same question that is involved in the bill now before this committee, cases where the man lost his life in the civil service, but who formerly served in the military service of the country and had been entitled to receive a pension. I wish to say that, in my judgment, if we open the doors to this class of cases we will be absolutely overwhelmed with them. There will be no protection to the committee, no protection to this House or to the Treasury of the Government from the vast avalanche of cases that will be brought before us. That is about all I wanted to say, and I say that simply for the protection of the committee. This class of cases ought not to be favorably recommended. It is enough for the committee to work upon cases of disability received in the military service of the United States until some general law is passed giving the widows of ex-soldiers who died in the civil service a pension. I believe it is improper to pass bills of this kind. I will say in this connection, while on the floor, that I understand there is before one of the committees of this House a bill involving this question of granting the widows of soldiers who died subsequently in the civil service of the Government or those who died from any cause a pension, where the party had, before his death, been entitled to receive it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PEELLE].

The question was taken; the committee divided, and there were—ayes 50, noes 0.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the further consideration of the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order.

Mr. COSGROVE. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The effect of the recommendation of the committee is to kill the bill. If that recommendation be adopted by the House, being an adverse recommendation, the effect that the gentleman proposes by his motion will be accomplished.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. I hope the bill will be acted upon in the regular way.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation of the committee that it do lie upon the table?

The question was taken; the committee divided, and there were—ayes 41, noes 12.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask my colleague if he will allow a vote in the House on this bill?

Mr. MATSON. I can not see any purpose that will be served by that. In the first place, I do not see how we can get it out of committee. I have no control of it. It is now under the control of this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee, by the vote just taken, reports the bill to the House with the recommendation that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. And I ask, before that vote is announced, if my colleague will consent to a vote in the House.

Mr. MATSON. I have not the power to consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it is not in the province of the gentleman's colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to say "yes" or "no" to the proposition. The vote must be taken in the House when the bill is reported back by the committee.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. Will the vote be taken when it is recommended that the bill be laid upon the table?

The CHAIRMAN. Unquestionably.

So (no further count being demanded) the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do lie on the table.

MARY ULLERY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4234) granting a pension to Mary Ullery.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Ullery, mother of Daniel Ullery, who was drowned while in the United States service as a member of Company D, Twelfth Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The report is as follows:

An examination of the papers on file in the Pension Office shows that the claimant is the mother of Daniel A. Ullery, who enlisted in Company D, Twelfth Ohio Volunteers, June 20, 1861, and was drowned in the Ohio River, near Portsmouth, Ohio, May 9, 1863, while returning from leave of absence.

The claim was rejected by the Pension Office because the soldier, at the time of his death, was not in line of duty, having been on furlough, which was not sick or veteran furlough—the only furlough recognized by the pension laws.

It appears from the evidence that Daniel A. Ullery procured leave of absence for fifteen days to return home to the death-bed of a sister, to whom he was much attached. She died, and, after her funeral, he took passage on his return to his command, and was accidently drowned as aforesaid.

The circumstances under which he was drowned are not shown, and probably nothing further on that point can be ascertained. The news of his death was communicated to the family of the deceased and the officers of his company by a member of Company H of the same regiment, who was on the boat at the time, who then learned that Ullery fell overboard and was drowned.

That Ullery was a good soldier and a man of steady habits, and that as an affectionate son and brother contributed to the wants of his widowed mother and sister, who were dependent upon him for support, is clearly shown.

This committee are clearly of opinion that the case under consideration is meritorious, and that the relief asked for should be granted, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. MOREY. I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I am unable to see how this bill comes within the application of the rule that the death of the party is at all connected with his duty in the Army. Here is the case of a man who is simply out of the service of the United States for the time being; a man who goes to his home not on leave of absence occasioned by sickness or disability and loses his life during his absence, and yet the committee recommend the granting of this pension. He lost his life not by reason of disability or anything that had occurred in connection with the Army, but simply because he fell overboard from the boat on which he took passage or was drowned in some other way. This may have been occasioned by his own negligence or carelessness. He may have slipped off; there might have been an accident; but I do not care whether it was an accident or otherwise, it does not affect the facts of the case as set forth by the report. But because the man is drowned in a manner totally disconnected with any service in the Army you propose to grant the pension. Now, I regard that as a departure from the rule which has been steadily followed and which the committee themselves have formulated.

Mr. MATSON. He was in the service.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. He was in the service; I am aware of that; but he was not on any service connected with the Army at the time of his death, and had he remained with his company he might have been uninjured and probably would have been from any such cause as that which produced his death. He might be living to-day.

What are the facts? He is not at his post of duty, but returning to his home or from his home, and during that time he falls overboard or by some such accident loses his life. To all intents and purposes, therefore, he was not in the service. He was away from his command on leave of absence when the accident occurred. I object, therefore, to the passage of such a bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 51, noes 8.

So (no further count being demanded) the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ELDREDGE (at 9.45 p. m.). I move that the committee rise.

Mr. MATSON. I desire to say to the gentleman from Michigan that on last Friday we dispensed with the evening session on the understanding among a number of us that the evening session to-night might be prolonged in order to make up for that loss of time.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I withdraw the motion.

ELENOR STOUGH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1164) to restore to the pension-roll the name of Elenor Stough, reported with an amendment.

The bill and amendment were read.

Mr. STEELE. I ask that this bill be passed over informally, and wait until the gentleman who reported it, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE FEVRE], is present.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ELIZABETH FOWLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2284) granting a pension to Elizabeth Fowler.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Fowler, the widow of Philo Fowler, late of Company A, Second Battalion, Seventeenth United States Infantry Volunteers of the State of Maine.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2284) granting a pension to Elizabeth Fowler, have had the same under consideration, and report as follows:

Elizabeth Fowler is the widow of Philo Fowler, late of Company A, Second Battalion, Seventeenth United States Infantry Volunteers of Maine, who was pensioned for wounds received at Gettysburg, and who died May 27, 1878. On the 29th of November following his death his widow filed her application for a pension in her own right, which was denied on the ground that the immediate cause of her husband's death, to wit, "hemorrhage of the stomach," was not the result of injuries for which he was pensioned nor due in any way to the same. On examination of the declaration and the papers submitted therewith your committee are unable to agree with the medical expert who rejected the case, and the reasons are briefly as follows:

Philo Fowler at the time of his enlistment, May 25, 1862, was in the very prime of life, healthy, strong, and full of vital force and energy; in three years he returned crippled for life and a confirmed invalid, and the cause was his Army experiences. He has no hospital record up to July, 1863, but at Gettysburg, while in line of duty and in action with the enemy, he was severely wounded in both knees, and lay on the field of battle five days uncared-for, through drenching rains and scorching suns, before he was removed to hospital at Harrisburg. There he remained several months, suffering more than the pains of death, unable to be moved, lying, as he says, in one position till his clothes rotted under him.

He was several times placed on the table to have his limbs amputated; was once carried to the dead-house supposed to be dying, and was for several weeks too low to speak; and yet, against all expectations, he recovered sufficiently to be sent to Portland, Me., where, on May 26, 1865, after three years of service and suffering, he was discharged, and returned to his home crippled, broken in health, with vital energies impaired, the wreck of his former self, and there, after lingering in pain and suffering thirteen years, he died; and yet this medical expert says "his death was not the result of his injuries nor due in any way to the same."

Dr. Hall, a physician of sixteen years' practice, testifies that he became acquainted with Philo Fowler soon after his discharge in 1865, learned his history, and became interested in the case, though he soon became satisfied medical treatment could not restore him. It was obvious that beyond the local injuries the soldier's vital energies were much reduced, his constitution broken, and his health permanently impaired. Deponent knew and observed said Fowler from his return home in June, 1865, to his death in 1878, and knows that he did not recover his health and tone, owing to the severe ordeal through which he passed while in the Army, and states professionally that the result of the hardships endured in service and hospital followed said soldier to his grave, and, if not the sole and immediate cause of his death, naturally hastened his end. Again, Dr. Hall says:

"The condition and appearance of said soldier, as I knew and observed him from the time he came home from the Army, and the developments of the post-mortem examination, clearly indicate former acute disease of the lungs. His wounds, injuries, and exposures not only tend, but were almost sure to produce such lung disease; that he has seldom seen a case in which cause and effect could be more clearly traced or in which the several steps were more obvious and consecutive."

To the lay mind there is no doubt that the injuries and sufferings of this soldier, consequent upon his military service, brought him to a premature grave, and under a fair construction of the law his widow is entitled to a pension. But in the examination of the papers it further appears that the life of the husband was not the only one sacrificed by this widow on the altar of patriotism. At the time of the enlistment of the father, Chauncy Fowler, an only son and child of Philo and Elizabeth Fowler, a boy 15 years of age, also enlisted in the same company, and served together till the vicissitudes of war separated them at the memorable battle of Gettysburg.

This son, after participating in seventeen actions, was made prisoner of war, confined at Belle Isle, and afterwards at Salisbury, N. C.; finally exchanged, furloughed, and sent North to his mother, a mere skeleton of the brave boy who left home three years before. By careful nursing he so far recovered as to return to Annapolis, and was honorably discharged June 13, 1865, but he never recovered his health. Exposure and starvation brought on curvature of spine and other consequent diseases, making him a confirmed invalid, requiring constant nursing till he died, May 26, 1874, at the early age of 26 years.

Elizabeth Fowler is now childless and a widow, with no means of support except her daily labor. The house in which she lives and from which she has buried both son and father is mortgaged to nearly its full value. The pension of her husband ceased at his death, and her application in her own right has been denied on the technicality "that his death was not the result of injuries for which her husband received a pension, nor due in any way to the same."

Believing that injustice has been done in denying her application and in refusing to reopen the case, your committee are of the opinion that the bill should pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

CHARLES D. DUNCAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1024) granting a pension to Charles D. Duncan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles D. Duncan, late of Company B, Fourth Regiment New York Heavy Artillery Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1024) granting a pension to Charles D. Duncan, having considered the same, beg leave to submit the following report:

The petitioner, on his own showing and that of one comrade, was wounded at the battle of Ream's Station, Va., on or about the 25th day of August, 1864, by the bursting of a shell, which broke two ribs in his left side. To this the claimant swears, and the affidavit of the comrade, William Schermerhorn, avers that at the time before stated, while in battle at Ream's Station, Duncan received a severe wound in the left side, caused by the fragment of a shell. Affiant states that he was present participating in said action with his comrade. His claim was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground of "no record of alleged wound, and inability to furnish evidence to show that it was received in the service and line of duty, and that he cannot furnish testimony of company officers or two privates." Duncan swears that the commissioned officer who was in command was killed during the battle—Second Lieut. J. P. Flanagan. The captain was not present. The patient was treated at field hospitals and several other hospitals, but the record seems to show that it was for diarrhea and debility from miasmatic diseases.

The testimony of his physician shows that there was an injury to the side, for he says that he had known him for many years, and with the exception of an attack of rheumatism, never knew him to be sick before enlistment. Dr. W. S. Layman, the physician who makes this affidavit, further says that he treated the soldier while on a furlough for an injury to the left side and a fracture of the ribs on or about the 8th of November, 1864. He treated the soldier again after discharge for a functional derangement of the liver, and that he was partially disabled from the injury to the left side.

The soldier enlisted December 16, 1861, as a private in Company B, Fourth Regiment New York Heavy Artillery, and was honorably discharged at Fairfax Seminary, Virginia, on the 27th December, 1864. As the soldier served faithfully, and received serious wounds which disable him, it seems that he should not be deprived of his pension because he can not furnish the full line of evidence required by the law. The committee think him entitled to a pension, and therefore recommend the passage of bill H. R. 1024, which simply places him upon the pension-roll subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

CAROLINE LAUFFER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1057) granting a pension to Caroline Lauffer.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Caroline Lauffer, widow of Jacob Lauffer, late of Company C, Sixth Connecticut Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1075) granting a pension to Caroline Lauffer, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to make the following report:

The petitioner is the widow of Jacob Lauffer, late private in Company C, Sixth Connecticut Volunteers, who received a gunshot wound at Bermuda Hundred, Va., June 17, 1864, and was pensioned "for resection of the head of left humerus," receiving $5.33½ per month from January 12, 1865; increased to $6 per month September 4, 1865, and again increased to $18 per month from November 1, 1872, and was last paid June 3, 1877, the soldier dying June 11, 1877. The increase of pension indicates that the disability was progressive. He left surviving four children, all of whom are under 16 years of age.

The widow's application for pension was filed December 31, 1877. The Pension Office rejected the claim on the ground that the fatal disease, "disease of kidneys and anasarca, was not the result of the resection of the wounded shoulder, and that the evidence does not show that said disease originated in the service."

In refutation of this conclusion we have the testimony of Dr. P. W. Mull, the physician who attended the soldier in his last illness. After giving a lengthy diagnosis of the case, showing when the soldier died, he concludes as follows:

"That his death was plainly due to waxy degeneration of the kidneys, and there is no reason to doubt that the disease was brought on by the prolonged suppuration from his wound. The gunshot wound in the shoulder, with its slow recovery, and the prolonged debility that attended it, stands in a true causation relative to the kidney disease, its complications with pneumonia and pleurisy, and death, finally, from general anasarca."

Dr. W. W. Ellsworth, in examining the soldier for an increase of pension, September 5, 1865, states that "the removal of three and a half inches of the upper end of the humerus, with a space now of two inches between the shaft and the glenoid cavity, leaves his upper arm no better than a rope."

Dr. A. P. Cook, examining surgeon, made also diagnosis of the soldier's disability in substance as above, and adds:

"He claims weakness and great tenderness, also inability to rest on his shoulder and arm. Has kidney and dropsical trouble; prognosis unfavorable."

The evidence of these surgeons indicates that the disease was continuous and progressive, and that it is not at all improbable that the death of the soldier was caused from the wound received at Bermuda Hundred.

The widow swears that she is very poor; and the fact that she has four children to support, and that her husband served faithfully and received severe wounds in the service, combined with the belief that his death was traceable to said wounds, impels your committee to say that she should have the relief asked, and therefore recommend the passage of bill H. R. 1075.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MRS. SEELYE, ALIAS FRANKLIN THOMPSON.

Mr. MATSON. In order that we may adjourn in good humor, I propose that the House shall hear a little romance. I ask that the bill (H. R. 5335), on page 36 of the Calendar, be taken up out of its order, and after that is disposed of I shall move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the bill indicated by the gentleman from Indiana being taken up out of its order? The Chair hears none.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5335) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah E. E. Seelye, alias Franklin Thompson.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Sarah E. E. Seelye, alias Franklin Thompson, who was late a private in Company F, Second Regiment of Michigan Infantry Volunteers, at the rate of $12 per month.

The report was read as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5335) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah E. E. Seelye, alias Franklin Thompson, submit the following report:

It appears from the certificate of the adjutant-general of the State of Michigan that Franklin Thompson enlisted in Company F, Second Regiment Michigan Infantry, May 25, A. D. 1861, at Detroit, Mich., and was duly mustered into the service of the United States for the term of three years, and, further, that he deserted at Lebanon, Ky., April 22, 1863.

From the time of enlistment up to that date the concurrent testimony of both comrades and officers is unanimous and highly eulogistic of the character, conduct, and meritorious services of said soldier. For nearly two years he remained with his regiment, sharing in all its toils and privations, marching and fighting in the various engagements in which it participated from the first disastrous battle at Bull Run and McClellan's peninsula campaign, and all through his memorable seven-days' fight across the peninsula to the James River. Through that ordeal, which taxed the endurance and courage of the strongest and bravest, he passed without a murmur, never absent from duty, obeying all orders with intelligence and alacrity, his whole aim and desire to render zealous and efficient aid to the Union cause. With his regiment he returned from the peninsula, and through subsequent movements of the Army, in the spring of 1863, the Second Michigan Infantry was at Lebanon, Ky., and then, as appears from the testimony, for the first time, Frank Thompson, suffering from malarial chills, applied for a furlough. William Shakspear, now quartermaster-general of Michigan, testifies as follows:

"I was a member of Company K, Second Michigan Infantry, from its organization until June, 1864; was well acquainted with Frank Thompson, of Company F, of the same regiment; knew he was a strong, healthy, and robust soldier, ever willing and ready for duty; [and further says:] I never knew of said Frank Thompson being sick, except in the spring of 1863, when he had chills. The exposure during the peninsula campaign, it is alleged, brought on malarial chills, and his application for furlough having been denied, the alternative was the hospital or absence without leave. He chose the latter, and the heretofore willing, cheerful soldier, who up to this time had always responded at roll-call and reveille, henceforth was marked a deserter."

Truth is ofttimes stranger than fiction, and now comes the sequel. Sarah Emma Edmons, now Sarah E. Seelye, alias Franklin Thompson, is now asking this Congress to grant her relief by way of a pension on account of failing health, which she avers had its incurrence and is the sequence of the days and nights she spent in the swamps of the Chickahominy in the days she went soldiering.

That Franklin Thompson and Mrs. Sarah E. E. Seelye are one and the same person is established by abundance of proof and beyond a doubt. She submits a statement, under oath, setting forth her history from the time of her enlistment at Detroit to the present time, and also the testimony of ten credible witnesses, men of intelligence, holding places of high honor and trust, who positively swear she is the identical Frank Thompson who enlisted in Company F, Second Michigan Infantry, May 25, 1861. Her history from the time she left the camp at Lebanon to the close of the war is mainly interesting and pertinent to this report as showing that though by the rules of war a deserter, yet her course and conduct after shows the same zeal in the service of her country in her proper character as actuated her when she first dedicated herself to the cause which she felt to be the highest and noblest that can actuate man or woman.

On leaving the regiment at Lebanon she went to Oberlin, Ohio, and for about a month retained her assumed character as a Union soldier; but the disease which she had contracted not readily yielding, she abandoned the idea of again joining her regiment and assumed her proper dress, and while recovering her health wrote a book, called The Nurse and Spy, and arranged with Hurlbut & Co., of Connecticut, to publish it, who testify to that fact, and that it had a circulation of about 175,000 copies; also that the author's share of profits was given to the Christian Sanitary Commission by the author, who herself joined the commission, and served as nurse in hospitals along the lines till the close of the war, dispensing her charities, which Hurlbut says was many hundred dollars, to the sick and wounded soldiers, relieving their necessities and aiding to restore them to health and the service of their country, and in this way rendered much more valuable aid to the cause nearest her heart than she could possibly have done as a soldier in the ranks. The several affidavits of General William Shakespear, Col. William B. McCreary, Lieutenant-Colonel Schneider, Col. Sylvester Larned, Capt. Damon Stewart, Capt. William R. Morse, and Comrade Milton S. Benjamin all testify positively as to her identity with Frank Thompson, and also to her Christian character and good services while in the Army.

Tho. Barrett, M. D., of Fort Scott, Kans., testifies that he has examined Mrs. Emma E. Seelye, and finds her suffering from symptoms of disease of the heart, which may be the sequel of inflammatory rheumatism; also has disease of liver. The viscus is enlarged; the skin and cornea have a yellow tinge. There is enlargement of spleen and symptoms of disease of kidney.

In view of her failing health, and the fact that her husband has no income except from his daily labor, and that she and her family are in indigent circumstances, your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Of course I am too gallant a man to oppose the passage of this bill; but I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] why, if the examination of the surgeons was so thorough as he has stated, the surgeons in this case did not discover the facts? [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I have not heard the gentleman's question.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, reported that the Committee of the Whole House had, according to the special order of the House, had under consideration the pension bills on the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report back sundry bills with various recommendations.

BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar without amendment, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 2325) granting a pension to Helen M. Harrison;

A bill (H. R. 1397) granting a pension to Albert O. Laufman, late second lieutenant of Company A, Sixty-third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. 282) to reinstate Cornelius Fitzgerald on the pension-roll;

A bill (H. R. 267) granting a pension to James King;

A bill (H. R. 1491) granting a pension to Sarah L. Harvey, mother of G. B. Harvey;

A bill (H. R. 1504) for the relief of Millia Staples;

A bill (H. R. 297) granting a pension to Violet Calloway;

A bill (H. R. 5259) granting a pension to Julia A. Ross;

A bill (H. R. 4234) granting a pension to Mary Ullery;

A bill (H. R. 2284) granting a pension to Elizabeth Fowler;

A bill (H. R. 1024) granting a pension to Charles B. Duncan;

A bill (H. R. 1075) granting a pension to Caroline Lauffer; and

A bill (H. R. 5335) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah E. E. Seelye, alias Franklin Thompson.

Amendments reported to the following bills were severally agreed to, and the bills as amended were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 3625) granting an increase of pension to Levi Anderson;

A bill (H. R. 2714) to increase the pension of Thomas E. Wilson;

A bill (H. R. 4141) for the relief of Mrs. Rebecca J. Pierce;

A bill (H. R. 1246) granting a pension to the widow of Maj. Gen. James B. Steedman;

A bill (H. R. 254) granting a pension to John Robbins;

A bill (H. R. 4368) granting an increase of pension to Dr. Samuel Davis;

A bill (H. R. 394) granting a pension to Mrs. M. C. Jones;

On motion of Mr. MATSON, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Mrs. Mary C. Jones."

A bill (H. R. 2319) granting a pension to Laura C. P. Haskins.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, of Wisconsin, the title was amended so as to read "A bill granting a pension to Laurena C. P. Haskins."

AMANDA E. HOYT.

The bill (H. R. 3603) granting a pension to Amanda E. Hoyt was reported from the Committee of the Whole House with an adverse recommendation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be laid upon the table.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. There is an amendment which I ask may be voted upon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "from and after the 27th day of August, 1883," and insert "from and after the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid on the table.

Mr. MATSON moved to reconsider the votes by which the several pension bills were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. MATSON (at 10 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until Monday next.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 31, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in answer in part to a resolution of the 20th ultimo, copies of communications from the United States attorney for Northern Florida, under date of May 15, 1882, and March 25, 1884, relating to the Arredondo grant, in Columbia County, Florida, and suits brought against the United States thereunder; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Attorney-General, communicating, in answer to a resolution of the 25th instant, his reasons for omitting to furnish certain information requested in the resolution of the 23d of January relative to the compensation of special attorneys in the star-route cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the Chair received the communication of the 28th of February, here referred to, and understood it, as it expressed itself, to be an inquiry whether a previous letter had been received. The Chair replied that it had been received and had been referred to the Committee on Appropriations; that it was not the custom of the President of the Senate to acknowledge the receipt of official communications, and that the second communication of the Attorney-General, which inclosed a copy of the first, would be laid before the Senate if desired. No answer was received, and as it was merely a repetition, the Chair did not lay it before the Senate.

The letter will be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kansas; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, as follows:

House concurrent resolution No. 4, relating to the payment of sufferers from the raid of Cheyenne Indians across the western part of Kansas in 1878.

Whereas during the year 1878 the Cheyenne Indians made a raid across the western part of Kansas; and

Whereas many persons were killed and a large amount of property was destroyed; and

Whereas a few of the claims have been paid; and

Whereas many of said claims for damages now remain unpaid and unadjusted; and

Whereas some of the sufferers lost everything they possessed and have never been able to recover any part of said property, and are now getting old and are in needy circumstances: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives requested to use all proper measures to secure a speedy settlement of these claims now remaining unpaid.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be instructed to forward a copy of these preambles and resolutions to the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. ALDRICH. I present a memorial of the city council of Providence, R. I. As it is short, I ask that it may be read.

The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

The City of Providence to the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The city council of the city of Providence respectfully represent that the business interest of the city, and of all that part of the New England States which centers here and makes Providence its market and port of shipment, requires a continued improvement of Narraganset Bay and Providence River and Harbor in removing the obstructions existing therein to the passage of vessels. The contemplated changes and improvement in railroad facilities in the city and the further improvement of our harbor and bay will be of great advantage in facilitating general business, and can not be overestimated for the future growth and prosperity of this section of New England.

The increase of importations, both foreign and domestic, into this port brought by vessels of greater tonnage is an important matter, and is one that would lead the city council to ask the honorable Senate and House of Representatives to continue the work of improvement, which, so far as has been done, has been of great benefit. The increased depth of channel dredged by the General Government has been of great advantage to this city and vicinity. The main channel should be widened and in many places straightened, and obstructions to its safe navigation now existing should be removed. The city council therefore respectfully ask the honorable Senate and House of Representatives to make such additional appropriations as are necessary for improving the harbor of Providence and Narraganset Bay that the location and natural advantages entitle them to.

Read; whereupon it is ordered that the same be received.

Passed: In common council March 3, 1884; in board of aldermen, March 6, 1884.

A true copy.

Witness:

HENRY V. A. JOSLINE, City Clerk.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of Clayton Lippincott and others, citizens of Moorestown, Burlington County, New Jersey, praying for an increase of appropriations for Indian education; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I present a memorial signed by various persons and firms engaged in the manufacturing business at Racine, Wis., remonstrating against the passage of the following bills relating to patents for inventions, namely: House bill No. 3925, relating to recoveries, &c., in infringement cases; House bill No. 3934, relating to users of patented articles, &c.; House bill No. 3617, reducing the duration of letters patent to five years; and Senate bill No. 1558, relating to defenses in suits for infringement, &c. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COKE presented the petition of Juan S. Hart, administrator of the estate of Simeon Hart, deceased, praying that Congress will authorize the payment of certain lost checks, drawn by disbursing officers of the United States, upon the execution by the petitioner of a sufficient indemnifying bond against their repayment by the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONGER presented a petition of A. C. Dubois and 21 others, citizens of Michigan, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 855) to repeal an act relating to vinegar factories established and operated prior to March 1, 1879, approved June 14, 1879; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUTLER presented resolutions of the Charleston (S. C.) Chamber of Commerce, in favor of the suspension of the coinage of the silver dollar; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Charleston (S. C.) Chamber of Commerce, favoring the establishment of a light-ship on Smith's Island, Cape Charles's shoals, Maryland; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a preamble and resolution of the Charleston (S. C.) Chamber of Commerce, in favor of the passage of the bill (H. R. 4483) to promote the efficiency of the revenue-marine service; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of J. E. Nelson, of Grahamville, S. C., praying for the passage of legislation to facilitate the execution of the pension laws; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VOORHEES presented a petition of 483 citizens of Yakima County, Washington Territory, praying that the lands which lie along the Cascade branch of the Northern Pacific Railroad be forfeited and opened for settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a letter from the Secretary of War, addressed to himself, inclosing a report from Col. W. E. Merrill, Corps of Engineers, in relation to the improvement of the Ohio River at and near the city of Lawrenceburg, Ind.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1455) for the relief of D. O. Adkinson, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 85) for the relief of the Citizens' Bank of Louisiana, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I desire simply to state that the report made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] is not unanimous; that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] and I dissent from it; and we ask to be permitted at some future time to submit our views dissenting from the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The views of the minority will be received hereafter, if there be no objection.

Mr. SLATER. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 929) granting a pension to Caroline Treckell, to report it adversely. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1824) to establish a forest reservation on the headwaters of the Missouri River and the headwaters and Clark's Fork of the Columbia River, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MAHONE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1839) for the erection of a public building at Chattanooga, Tenn., reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally with amendments:

A bill (S. 634) for a public building at Opelousas, La.;

A bill (S. 1740) for the erection of a public building at Troy, N. Y.; and

A bill (S. 877) to provide for the construction of a public building at Portland, Oreg.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PLATT introduced a bill (S. 1949) granting a pension to Elise Burke; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL introduced a bill (S. 1950) to authorize the construction of a highway bridge across that part of the waters of Lake Champlain lying between the towns of North Hero and Alburg, in the State of Vermont; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARRISON introduced a bill (S. 1951) granting a pension to Martin Bever; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 1952) for the relief of the legal representatives of John Geisel, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1953) for the relief of Michael Riley; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1954) making an appropriation to pay the expenses of a military expedition for the exploration of the Territory of Alaska; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (S. 1955) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the Richland Volunteer Rifle Company, of Columbia, S. C., fifty breech-loading Springfield rifles; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HARRIS introduced a bill (S. 1956) for the relief of Mrs. E. G. C. Abbott; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 1957) granting a pension to Henry W. Edens; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JACKSON introduced a bill (S. 1958) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Nashville, Tenn.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1959) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at or near Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," &c.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 1960) for the relief of Mary Howard Farquhar; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1961) supplementary to an act approved June 19, 1878, giving to the Court of Claims jurisdiction of the Caldera claims upon the Chinese indemnity fund; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MAHONE introduced a bill (S. 1962) to allow drawback on imported materials used in the manufacture of tobacco, snuff, and cigars exported from the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VAN WYCK (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1963) for the relief of J. G. Fill, Edward Harper, and George Burnham; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 1964) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Kate M. Rodgers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALDRICH introduced a bill (S. 1965) to extend the letters patent granted to Charles H. Field; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 1966) granting the right of way to the Saint Louis and Baxter Springs and Mexican Railroad Company through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 116) for the relief of the sureties of the late J. O. Rawlins;

A bill (H. R. 254) granting a pension to John Robbins;

A bill (H. R. 267) granting a pension to James King;

A bill (H. R. 282) to reinstate Cornelius Fitzgerald on the pension-roll;

A bill (H. R. 297) granting a pension to Violet Calloway;

A bill (H. R. 394) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary C. Jones;

A bill (H. R. 1024) granting a pension to Charles B. Duncan;

A bill (H. R. 1075) granting a pension to Caroline Lauffer;

A bill (H. R. 1246) granting a pension to the widow of Maj. Gen. James B. Steedman;

A bill (H. R. 1327) for the relief of J. H. Hammond;

A bill H. R. 1397) granting a pension to Albert O. Laufman, late second lieutenant of Company A, Sixty-third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. 1491) granting a pension to Sarah L. Harvey, mother of G. B. Harvey;

A bill (H. R. 1504) for the relief of Millia Staples;

A bill (H. R. 2240) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Assistant Engineer John W. Saville a passed assistant engineer on the retired-list of the Navy;

A bill (H. R. 2284) granting a pension to Elizabeth Fowler;

A bill (H. R. 2319) granting a pension to Laurena C. P. Haskins;

A bill (H. R. 2325) granting a pension to Helen M. Harrison;

A bill (H. R. 2551) granting a pension to Charles Munroe;

A bill (H. R. 2714) to increase the pension of Thomas E. Wilson;

A bill (H. R. 3625) granting an increase of pension to Levi Anderson;

A bill (H. R. 3936) for the relief of Benjamin F. Millard;

A bill (H. R. 4141) for the relief of Mrs. Rebecca J. Pierce;

A bill (H. R. 4234) granting a pension to Mary Ullery;

A bill (H. R. 4268) granting an increase of pension to Dr. Samuel Davis;

A bill (H. R. 5335) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah E. E. Seelye, alias Franklin Thompson.

PATENT OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no "concurrent or other resolutions" that order is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under the eighth rule.

Mr. PLATT. I ask that the Senate will consider the bill which I introduced on the 24th instant, being the bill (S. 1924) providing for the organization of the Patent Office into an independent department, and for giving it the exclusive control of the building known as the Patent Office and of the fund pertaining to that office. I gave notice that I would at this time ask to submit some remarks upon the bill. The bill lies upon the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves to take from the table for consideration, with a view to his submitting some remarks upon it, the bill indicated by him. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate. Does the Senator from Connecticut desire to have the bill read at length?

Mr. PLATT. I do not care to have it read.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment to call up a matter which will not cause any discussion?

Mr. PLATT. If it will cause no discussion I shall be glad to yield to the Senator, but if it is going to give rise to discussion I should be very glad to conclude my remarks before 2 o'clock to-day if I can.

Mr. FRYE. I will not disturb the Senator.

Mr. PLATT addressed the Senate. Having spoken till 2 o'clock,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut will please suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be informally laid aside in order that the Senator from Connecticut may conclude his remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside in order that the Senator from Connecticut may continue his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAIR. I would like to ask the Senator if he can give some intimation as to the length of time he will probably occupy. I do not rise for the purpose of objecting, but I would like to know how long he will speak. If it embarrasses the Senator, I do not ask him to answer; but I supposed he might give some idea.

Mr. PLATT. It occurs to me that if I tell how long it will take me to finish, very likely the Senator will run away. [Laughter.] I would rather not make any definite statement on that subject.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator means to take up the whole afternoon, I should like to know it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Connecticut will proceed.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I do not think that the bill which I have introduced is by any means a perfect bill. It is not original with me. It is a bill which was introduced, I think, in the Forty-fifth Congress by Mr. Phelps, a member of the House of Representatives from Connecticut. I am not aware that any action was taken upon it in the House, but it will serve to bring before the committee and before Congress a matter which I think is important, and the favorable consideration of which I think is essential to the best interests and welfare of this country.

The growth of our patent system, its vast importance, its intimate connection with and direct influence upon the property of the country demand that it shall receive a degree of attention which it can not and will not receive while it remains a merely subordinate bureau of the Interior Department.

The patent system has its foundation in the Constitution of the United States. In the grant of enumerated powers, article 1, section 8, and paragraph 8, we find this power granted to Congress:

> To promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.

When the fathers wrote that clause into the Constitution of the United States they builded better than they knew. They knew indeed that the prosperity of every nation must depend largely upon the progress of the useful arts. They knew that if this country was to attain the glory and the power which they hoped for it, it must be along the road of invention; but they could not, the wildest dreamer, the statesman with the most vivid imagination could never have dreamed, could never have imagined the blessings, the beneficial results which should flow and have flowed from the exercise of the power thus granted to Congress. The foundations which they then laid of our progress, our welfare, our strength, and our glory were granite, and we have builded wisely upon them; but I think that we may do much to improve the temple which has been reared.

I wish I knew the author of that clause in the Constitution. I have sought diligently in the records of those days that I might discover who he was. It was not in the original draft of the Constitution presented by Mr. Pinckney to the convention on May 29, 1787. In that draft, immediately after the power given to Congress to establish post-roads, was the power to establish a national university at Washington; but when the Constitution came finally to be adopted the power to establish a national university at Washington had disappeared from the original draft or plan presented by Mr. Pinckney, and the present clause granting Congress the power to promote the progress of the useful arts seems to have taken its place.

The first reference that I find to it is in the debates of the convention. In Elliot's Debates, volume 5, page 439, I find that on the 18th of August:

> In Convention—Mr. Madison submitted, in order to be referred to the committee of detail, certain powers, as proper to be added to those of the general legislature.
> Among these proposed powers are enumerated the following:
> To secure to literary authors their copyrights for a limited time. * * * To encourage, by premiums and provisions, the advancement of useful knowledge and discoveries.

On the same day Mr. Pinckney submitted certain propositions as to the powers proper to be granted to Congress, among which was the power "to grant patents for useful inventions," also "to secure to authors exclusive rights for a certain time." The committee of eleven, through Mr. Brearly, reported on the 5th of September five clauses which it was proposed to incorporate in the Constitution. The fifth clause was the one relating to the progress of science and the useful arts:

> To promote the progress of science and the useful arts by securing for limited times, to authors and inventors, the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.

It is verbatim the clause which is at present in the Constitution. It appears that this clause was agreed to without contradiction. It seems to have excited but comparatively little interest at that time. Very slight reference is made to it in the Federalist. The only reference that I find is in No. 43 of the Federalist, on page 338, a paper by Mr. Madison, in which he says:

> The fourth class comprises the following miscellaneous powers:
> 1. A power to "promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for a limited time to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries."
> The utility of this power will scarcely be questioned. The copyright of authors has been solemnly adjudged in Great Britain to be a right at common law. The right to useful inventions seems with equal reason to belong to the inventors. The public good fully coincides in both cases with the claims of individuals.
> The States can not separately make effectual provision for either of the cases, and most of them have anticipated the decision of this point by laws passed at the instance of Congress.

It had been the practice of the State Legislatures in some of the States, and especially in the State of Connecticut, upon petition to grant patents to inventors. I am not aware that any public act providing for the granting of patents was ever adopted in any State prior to the adoption of our Federal Constitution; but I find that in Connecticut quite a large number of patents were granted upon petition. I have here a list of some of them furnished me by the kindness of the State librarian, Mr. Hoadly:

> Volume VI, page 25. To Edward Hinman, for making molasses from corn-stalks; ten years. October, 1717.
> Volume VI, page 79. To John Prout, &c., for making linseed-oil; twenty years. October, 17, 1718. A new grant to the same (page 143) for making linseed and rape oil. October, 1719; twenty years.
> Volume VI, page 312. Ebenezer Fitch, slitting mill; fifteen years. May, 1722.
> Volume VI, 572. Richard Rogers, making duck; seven years. October, 1725.
> Volume VII, 174. Samuel Higley, &c., making steel; ten years. May, 1728.
> Volume VIII, 395. Samuel Willard, &c., making potash; ten years. May, 1741.
> Volume VIII, 338. Thomas Fitch, &c., making steel; fifteen years. October, 1740.
> Volume IX, 281. Thomas Darling, making glass; twenty years. May, 1747.
> Volume X, 231. Jabez Hamlin, &c., flax dressing; fifteen years. October, 1753.
> October, 1783. Benjamin Hanks. A clock which will wind itself up; fourteen years.
> 1780. Mosely & Little. Exclusive privilege of making glass; fifteen years (probably they did not set up works). For January, 1783, exclusive privilege of making glass for twenty years was granted to William and Elisha Pitkin.
> June, 1784. William Pitkin. Exclusive privilege of making snuff; fourteen years.

The references are to the published colonial records of Connecticut. One very curious thing appears by this list, curious in view of the fact that it is now asserted by men who have made diligent experiments that sugar can be profitably manufactured from corn-stalks as well as sorghum, that the first patent ever granted by the Legislature of Connecticut should have related to this same system. It was to Edward Hinman, for making molasses from corn-stalks, ten years; the date, October, 1717.

A very full reference to the patents granted in Connecticut is to be found in the Patent Office Report of 1851, covering nearly fifty pages, and showing that a public act for the encouragement of the raising of silk in the colony of Connecticut was passed in 1732, from which I think it is fair to say the silk industry of Connecticut has grown.

It would be interesting to inspect one of the letters patent thus granted by State Legislatures prior to the national Constitution. I have never seen one, but I find in a speech of ex-Senator Wadleigh, of New Hampshire, in the Forty-fifth Congress, that he said:

> An intelligent gentleman of my own State has referred me to an act of the general court of the colony of Massachusetts Bay, passed in 1646, granting to one of his ancestors, Joseph Jenks, the exclusive right of making and selling his improved scythe for the term of fourteen years. That, I think, was the first patent granted to an inventor in America. The improvement referred to changed the short, thick, straight English scythe into the longer, thinner, curved implement, with stiffened back, now in use.

But the framers of the Constitution saw that the power, to be effective, must be a national power, must be exercised by the National Government rather than by the States. Congress soon passed a law. The first patent act was passed April 10, 1790. It was reported by a Representative from South Carolina, who was chairman of a committee of the House of Representatives appointed during the first session of Congress (several petitions having been presented praying Congress to grant patents for specified inventions) "to consider measures to promote the progress of the useful arts." That committee consisted of Mr. Burke, of South Carolina, Benjamin Huntington, of Norwich, Conn., and Mr. Cadwalader, of New Jersey; and I hope that the time is in the near future when Senators and Representatives from South Carolina will again join with Senators and Representatives from Connecticut and New Jersey in the passage of laws which shall have a tendency further to promote the progress of the useful arts and sciences by the perfection of the patent system and the emancipation of the Patent-Office from the servitude to which it has been too long subjected. The traditionary history of this act is interesting, and I will ask the Secretary to read from the copy of the Official Gazette, published on the 24th of September, 1877, the passage which I have marked in reference to the history of this act.

> By act of April 10, 1790, the first American patent system was founded. Thomas Jefferson inspired it, and may be said to have been the father of the American Patent Office. He took great pride in it, it is said, and gave personal consideration to every application that was made for a patent during the years between 1790 and 1793, while the power of revision and rejection granted by that act remained in force. It is related that the granting of a patent was held to be in these early times quite an event in the history of the State Department, where the clerical part of the work was then performed.

It is a matter of tradition, handed down to us from generation to generation by those who love to speak of Mr. Jefferson and his virtues and eccentricities, that when an application for a patent was made under the first act he would summon Mr. Henry Knox, of Massachusetts, who was Secretary of War, and Mr. Edmund Randolph, of Virginia, who was Attorney-General, these officials being designated by the act, with the Secretary of State, a tribunal to examine and grant patents, and that these three distinguished officials would examine the application critically, scrutinizing each point of the specification and claims carefully and rigorously. The result of this examination was that during the first year a majority of the applications failed to pass the ordeal, and only three patents were granted. In those days every step in the issuing of a patent was taken with great care and caution, Mr. Jefferson seeking always to impress upon the minds of his officers and the public that the granting of a patent was a matter of no ordinary importance.

Mr. PLATT. The first patent act provided that the petitions for a patent should be addressed to the Secretary of State, the Secretary for the Department of War, and the Attorney-General, setting forth the invention or discovery, &c., and that the letters patent, if the same should be granted, should be made out in the name of the United States and bear teste by the President of the United States. They should be delivered to the Attorney-General of the United States to be examined, who should within fifteen days next after the delivery to him, if he should find the same conformable to the act, certify the same at the foot thereof, and present letters patent so certified to the President, who should cause the seal of the United States to be thereto affixed.

Under this act the fees to be paid by the applicant were as follows:

For receiving and filing the petition, 50 cents; for filing specifications, per copy-sheet containing one hundred words, 10 cents; for making out patent, $2; for affixing great seal, $1; for indorsing the day of delivering the same to the patentee, including all intermediate services, 20 cents.

This act remained in force until the 21st of February, 1793, when a new act was passed and the old one repealed. Under the act of 1793 the petition was made to the Secretary of State alone. If the Secretary of State believed that a patent should be granted he then referred the papers to the Attorney-General to be examined, who within fifteen days was required to certify the same as before.

In this act was included the right to assign the patent, and the fee was raised to $30. The practice under the act of 1793 continued without substantial change until July 4, 1836, when the act which is really the foundation of our present patent system was passed. Prior to 1836 there was no critical examination made of the application or of the state of the art to determine whether the alleged invention was really new or useful, or whether it had been anticipated by other inventions which had been patented.

I have here a report of all the patents which were granted by the United States prior to 1836, and a most interesting volume it is. The first was granted July 31, 1790, to Samuel Hopkins, for making pot and pearl ashes. An examination of the patents granted between 1790 and 1810 shows most surprisingly the germ of the ideas which by subsequent improvements have been incorporated into our inventive system.

Among the patents granted during the first ten years after the passage of the original patent law of 1790 was one for a "machine for thrashing wheat, &c.," to William Thompson; one for "propelling boats by steam, &c.," to John Fitch; one for a "machine for ginning cotton," to Eli Whitney; one for a "mode of preventing the progress of fire," to Benjamin Taylor; one for a "conjurer for cooking and boiling," to Thomas Passmore; one for an "improvement in stoves," to James McCallmont; one for "improvement in clocks, watches, and time-keepers," to Eli Terry; for a "telegraph (description filed)," to Jonathan Grant, jr.; for a "machine for raising water (a perpetual motion)," to John Baptiste Aveilhé; for an "improvement in the plow," to John Deaver.

By the act of 1836 a board of examiners was created. The official system was not a very large one at that time. The Patent Office was created, but it was attached to the Department of State. It was provided—

That there shall be established and attached to the Department of State an office to be denominated the Patent Office, the chief officer of which shall be called the Commissioner of Patents, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

There were provided for said office, to be appointed by the Commissioner of Patents, with the approval of the Secretary of State, a chief clerk, an examining clerk, three other clerks, a machinist, and a messenger. That constituted in 1836 the entire force of the Patent Office. In 1849 the office was disconnected from the Department of State and attached to the Department of the Interior, which was then created. Section 2 of the act to establish the Home Department and provide for the Treasury Department an assistant Secretary of the Treasury and a commissioner of customs provided—

That the Secretary of the Interior shall exercise and perform all the acts of supervision and appeal in regard to the office of Commissioner of Patents, now exercised by the Secretary of State; and the said Secretary of the Interior shall sign all requisitions for the advance or payment of money, &c.

About 10,000 patents had been issued prior to 1836. In the copy of the Official Gazette, to which I have heretofore referred, published on the 24th of September, 1877, I have the number of patents granted year to year from 1790 to 1836, which I will not stop to read, but will ask to have incorporated in my remarks. It shows that 3 were granted in 1790, 33 in 1791; the list gradually increased each year until in 1836 the number was 723.

The following is the statement referred to:

The number of patents granted each year from 1790 to July 4, 1836, is as follows: In 1790, 3; in 1791, 33; in 1792, 11; in 1793, 20; in 1794, 22; in 1795, 12; in 1796, 44; in 1797, 51; in 1798, 28; in 1799, 44; in 1800, 41; in 1801, 44; in 1802, 65; in 1803, 97; in 1804, 84; in 1805, 57; in 1806, 63; in 1807, 99; in 1808, 158; in 1809, 203; in 1810, 223; in 1811, 215; in 1812, 238; in 1813, 181; in 1814, 210; in 1815, 173; in 1816, 206; in 1817, 174; in 1818, 222; in 1819, 156; in 1820, 155; in 1821, 168; in 1822, 200; in 1823, 173; in 1824, 228; in 1825, 204; in 1826, 323; in 1827, 331; in 1828, 368; in 1829, 447; in 1830, 544; in 1831, 573; in 1832, 474; in 1833, 586; in 1834, 630; in 1835, 757; in 1836, 723.

To show the appreciation of the patent system at this time, I read a single sentence from the report of the first Patent Commissioner, Henry L. Ellsworth, made to Congress for the years 1837 and 1838. He says:

The Patent Office has been greatly subservient to the promotion of the arts and sciences, and its late reorganization will extend in a much higher degree its usefulness. Without the encouragement of the patent laws few inventions would become practically useful. By this encouragement a stimulus is given to talent and ingenuity, and the result of human effort seems almost incredible. The inventions of the day have proverbially overcome time and space. The numerous manufactories spread over all the country attest the patronage they have received from Government.

Remember that this was in 1838.

Of late, however, inventors have directed their attention with peculiar interest to the improvement of the implements of agriculture, and many labor-saving machines have been patented, which are of the highest utility to the husbandman. These are rapidly increasing, and it is scarcely possible to conjecture to what extent the labor of the agriculturist may be diminished and the products of the country increased by these improvements. Already the process of sowing, of mowing, and of reaping is successfully performed by horse-power, and inventors are sanguine in the belief (and probably not without reason) that the time is not far distant when plowing-machines will be driven by steam and steam-power applied to many other operations of the husbandman.

Mr. President, to my mind the passage of the act of 1836 creating the Patent Office marks the most important epoch in the history of our development—I think the most important event in the history of our Government from the Constitution until the war of the rebellion. The establishment of the Patent Office marked the commencement of the marvelous development of the resources of the country which is the admiration and wonder of the world, a development which challenges all history for a parallel; and it is not too much to say that this unexampled progress has been not only dependent upon but has been coincident with the growth and development of the patent system of this country. Words fail in attempting to portray the advancement of this country for the last fifty years. We have had fifty years of progress, fifty years of inventions applied to the every-day wants of life, fifty years of patent encouragement, and fifty years of a development in wealth, resources, grandeur, culture, power, which is little short of miraculous. Population, production, business, wealth, comfort, culture, power, grandeur, these have all kept step with the expansion of the inventive genius of this country; and this progress has been made possible only by the inventions of its citizens. All history confirms us in the conclusion that it is the development by the mechanic arts of the industries of a country which brings to it greatness and power and glory. No purely agricultural, pastoral people ever achieved any high standing among the nations of the earth. It is only when the brain evolves and the cunning hand fashions labor-saving machines that a nation begins to throb with new energy and life and expands with a new growth. It is only when thought wrings from nature her untold secret treasures that solid wealth and strength are accumulated by a people. Especially is this true in a republic. Under arbitrary forms of government kings may oppress the laborer, kings may conquer other nations, may oppress, and degrade the men who till the soil, and they may thus acquire wealth; but in a republic it is only when the citizen conquers nature, appropriates her resources, and extorts her riches that you find real wealth and power.

We witness our development; we are proud of our success; we congratulate ourselves, we felicitate ourselves on all that we enjoy; but we scarcely ever stop to think of the cause of all this prosperity and enjoyment. Indeed, this prosperity has become so common that we expect it. Many men forget to what they owe it; many men, I am sorry to say, in these recent years deny the cause of it all. The truth is, we live in this atmosphere of invention; it surrounds us as does the light and the air; like light and air it is one of our greatest blessings; and yet we pass it by without thought. Some say that the cause of all this wealth, of all this influence in the world, springs from other sources; some say it is the result of our free institutions, of our Christian civilization, of our habits of industry, of our respect for law, of the vastness of our natural resources, but I say inventive skill is the primal cause of all this progress and growth. I say the policy which found expression in the Constitution of the United States when this clause was enacted giving Congress power "to promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries" has been the policy that has built up this fair fabric.

Concede all you claim: free institutions, Christian civilization, industrious habits; grant respect for law; acknowledge all our vast natural resources; and then deduct patents and patented inventions from the causes which have led to this development, and you have subtracted from material, yes, from moral, prosperity nearly all that is worth enjoying. Subtract invention from the causes which have led to our growth and our grandeur and you remit us, you remit our people, to the condition of the people of Italy, of Switzerland, of Russia. If "knowledge is power," invention is prosperity.

Let us turn a moment from the present and take one rapid glance at the past. Consider the country as it was fifty years ago. The cotton-gin, the steamboat, the railroad, the power-loom, the printing-press, were indeed in embryo, but their development was partial and their use was extremely limited. It was still the age of homespun; it was still the age of hand labor. Brain had not, so far as production was concerned, superseded muscle. We had then twenty-six States. When the commencement of our present patent system really began there were twenty-six States in the Union. Twelve new ones and eight Territories added since are in my judgment a tribute to the inventive genius of this country and to the perfection of its patent system. There are at least ten Senators occupying seats on the floor of the Senate to-day who would not be here but for the patent system of the United States.

Our conception of history in those days was only that of war and diplomacy. Industrial development formed no part of the history of a country in the estimation of statesmen and publicists.

Let me allude to my own State. I am not a very old man, but recollection carries me back fifty years, when there was no railroad, no coal used, no steam power used; no woolen factories except of the rudest sort; no telegraph in Connecticut. Possibly there were one hundred tons of coal consumed in the State annually. It is possible that there was the rude beginning of manufacturing establishments in which steam was the motive power; but practically there were none of these improvements in Connecticut. The people were rural and agricultural; a few shops, water furnishing the motive power, were scattered up and down the streams of the State, but almost the entire population were engaged in agriculture. It was a time when the handbrake and the hetchel prepared the flax which was raised within her borders, when hand spinning and the hand-loom prepared it for use. My mind goes back and takes in the days of my early boyhood, when wool was carded by hand, when it was spun and woven by the mothers and the daughters, when it was then taken to the fulling-mill, and when the tailoress came and in the household cut and made the cloth into garments for the use of the family. It was the day of the village shoemaker, the day of the grist-mill, the day of the stage-coach, the day of the pillion. There was no carpet; no piano; few books; hand sewing only; hand knitting; the tallow candle; the unwarmed, unlighted church; the school-house with its hard, rough benches; and the slow post-route, the mail once a week; a weekly paper only. It was a week's journey from Connecticut to Washington; six weeks' journey from Connecticut to Ohio. Five thousand dollars in those days was a competence and $10,000 was a fortune. What has accomplished all the transformation which we witness as we compare the condition of the country fifty years ago with its condition at the present day?

I insist, Mr. President, that it is traceable directly to invention. The railroad is the child of patented inventions, the production of cotton, silk, broadcloth, and linen is due absolutely and entirely to the perfection of machinery for their manufacture. The daily press, the teeming books, are part of our civilization. They are all dependent upon patented inventions. The carpet, the piano, and the carriage conduce to our comfort and our convenience, and they also are children of patents. Every comfort which we have, every convenience which we enjoy, every element of wealth which we acquire, has its root and development in the patent system of this country. They are born of patents, and they live only by permission of patents.

To illustrate this proposition I ask the Senate to bear with a few statistics.

I have said that the number of patents granted from 1790 to 1837 was about 10,000. The number granted from 1837 to 1884 is over 300,000. I present a statement, prepared at the Patent Office, showing the number granted year by year from 1836 until the present time, and it will appear by reference to it that in 1840 458 were granted, that in 1850 884 were granted, that in 1860 4,363 were granted, that in 1870 12,157 were granted, that in 1880, there not appearing to have been any great increase during that decade, 12,926 were granted, that in 1883 21,196 were granted. These are original mechanical patents, not including patents for designs and reissues.

I will ask to have incorporated as part of my remarks a table showing the issue of patents year by year from 1837, with the cash received and cash expended, and the surplus each year, which has been paid into the Treasury of the United States, up to and inclusive of the year 1883.

Now, bearing in mind this wonderful development of patented inventions in the United States, this wonderful growth of the patent system, I ask the Senate to look at the corresponding growth and development of business, property, and wealth in this country. Patented inventions and material prosperity have locked arms and joined each other in this march of progress and greatness.

The population of the United States has increased from 1840—and I take that decade because it is really the commencement of the expansion of the patent system of the country—from a trifle over 17,000,000 in 1840 to over 50,000,000 in 1880. I have the figures for each decade from 1840 to 1880:

| 1840 | 17,069,453 |
| 1860 | 31,443,321 |
| 1880 | 50,155,743 |

The aggregate wealth of the United States has increased from about $7,000,000,000 in 1850, there being no statistics earlier than that, to over $43,000,000,000 in 1880.

The complete figures are given in the following table furnished me by Mr. Nimmo, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, but prepared, I think, by Mr. Dodge, statistician of the Agricultural Department:

Statement showing the true value of real estate and personal property in the United States for 1850, 1860, 1870, and 1880.

[From the United States Census Reports, 1870 and 1880.]

| Years. | Total value of property. | Estimated value of slaves. | Total, less value of slaves. |
| 1850 | $7,135,780,228 | a $640,862,600 | $6,494,917,628 |
| 1860 | 16,159,616,068 | b 988,440,000 | 17,171,176,068 |
| 1870 | 30,068,518,507 | ..... | 30,068,518,507 |
| 1880 | 43,642,000,000 | ..... | 43,642,000,000 |

a Estimated at $200 each. b Estimated at $250 each.

Now look at the increase of the value of manufactured products in the United States. I have no statistics for 1840, but in 1850 the value of manufactured products as given by the census was a trifle over $1,000,000,000; in 1880 it was $5,369,579,191.

I ask permission to insert the figures without stopping to read those of the intervening decades.

Value of manufactured products: 1840, not given; 1850, $1,019,106,616; 1860, $1,885,861,676; 1870, $4,231,325,442; 1880, $5,369,579,191.

Now look at the increase in the value of farms, for I shall have something to say before I conclude my remarks on the relation of patented inventions to the agricultural pursuits of the country.

The value of improved farms in the United States for 1840 is not given in the census statistics. In 1850 it was $3,271,575,426—a little over three billions. In 1880 it was over ten billion dollars—$10,197,096,776.

The complete statement is as follows: Value of improved farms in the United States: 1840, not given in census returns; 1850, $3,271,575,426; 1860, $6,645,045,007; 1870, $9,262,803,861 (currency basis), $7,500,000,000 (gold basis); 1880, $10,197,096,776.

As to the value of farm products, there are no statistics of any value prior to 1880, because they were not taken separately. The census gives the value in 1880 as $2,213,402,564. The statistics of Mr. Dodge, of the Agricultural Department, and Mr. Nimmo, of the Bureau of Statistics, agree that the amount is not large enough and fix the amount at $3,600,000,000 as the value of farm products in 1880.

Now look at the increase of cereal products. In 1840 the bushels of corn produced were 377,531,875; in 1880, 1,754,591,676 bushels. I have the totals from 1840 to 1880 of corn, oats, wheat, rye, barley, and buckwheat, which I will insert without reading:

|---|---|---|
| | Bushels. | Bushels. |
| Corn | 377,531,875 | 1,754,591,676 |
| Oats | 123,071,341 | 407,859,999 |
| Wheat | 84,823,272 | 459,483,137 |
| Rye | 18,645,567 | 19,841,595 |
| Barley | 4,161,504 | 43,977,495 |
| Buckwheat | 7,291,743 | 11,817,227 |
| Total | 615,525,302 | 2,697,581,229 |

The increase from 1840 to 1880, taking all cereals, has been 400 per cent. and more. We raised in 1880 of cereal products about fifty-four bushels to every inhabitant of the United States.

Look at the production of coal. I find no statistics back of 1870. In 1870, 32,000,000 tons in round numbers were produced; in 1880, 87,000,000 tons in round numbers.

Take the cotton and tobacco crops of the country. In the year 1850 the number of cotton bales was 2,469,093; in 1880, 5,755,359. The number of pounds of tobacco raised in 1850 was 199,752,655 pounds; in 1880, 472,661,157.

Take the statistics of the exports and imports. The imports of merchandise in 1840—I will not stop to read all the figures, but will insert them without reading fully—were $98,000,000, in ro nd numbers; in 1883 it was $723,000,000. The exports of domestic merchandise in 1840 were $111,000,000; in 1883, $804,000,000. The exports of domestic manufactured products in 1840 were $12,000,000; in 1883, $111,000,000. The exports of products of domestic agriculture, exclusive of raw cotton, in 1840 were $28,000,000; in 1883, $474,000,000. The export of raw cotton in 1840 was $63,000,000; in 1883, $247,000,000. The exports of domestic provisions in 1840 were three and a half million dollars, in round numbers; in 1883, $107,000,000.

In 1840 we had 2,818 miles of railroad; in 1883 we had 119,739 miles of railroad—railroads enough to go five times around the globe.

The following are the values of the imports and exports of the United States during the fiscal years 1840, 1880, and 1883 (the fiscal year 1840 ended with September 30, the years 1880 and 1083 with June 30):

But the increase in the production of wool is perhaps as significant as that in any other line of production. I submit a table showing the production and consumption of wool in the country for the years 1840, 1850, 1860, and year by year from 1862 to 1882. The production in 1840 was about 36,000,000 pounds, increasing until 1882, when the production was 290,000,000 pounds.

Quantities of wool produced, imported, exported, and retained for consumption in the United States by decades from 1840 to 1860, inclusive, and annually from 1863 to 1883, inclusive.

Here I desire to call attention to the report of Mr. Dodge, statistician of the Department of Agriculture, relating to the wages of farm laborers, which is Report No. 4 of the new series, an extremely interesting and suggestive report. He says:

> Miners, mechanics, and especially artisans and operatives engaged in productive occupations, are vastly more beneficial to agriculture, for two reasons: first, they augment the numbers to be fed and increase agricultural values; second, they make something themselves which farmers need, and reduce the prices of commodities hitherto brought from a distance at unnecessary cost.

Then he goes on to compare the amount of manufacturing in each State with the value of the lands in each State, and he says:

> The result of this comparison shows in every State, without exception, a higher average value of farm land in that portion of each State which makes the largest value of the products of manufacturing industry.

He contrasts two sections of each State, showing the value of farm lands in the counties having a certain amount of manufacturing carried on therein, which he classes as manufacturing counties, and the other counties, which he classes as non-manufacturing counties. For instance, there are in Alabama two manufacturing counties that produce annually more than $2,000,000. The value of land per acre in those counties is $6.55. The other sixty-four counties of the State are classed as non-manufacturing counties, and the value of the land per acre in those counties is $4.13. In Arkansas, in the manufacturing counties, the value of land per acre is $11.87; in the other counties, $6.07. In Connecticut, where we have large manufacturing industries, in the manufacturing counties—that is, in the three counties where the manufacturing interest is large compared with the remaining counties—the value of the farm lands is $71.84 per acre; in the other counties it is $34.60 per acre. I think the more fertile lands are to be found in the counties which manufacture least, showing that the increased value in the manufacturing counties is due directly to the influence of the manufactories. In Georgia, in the manufacturing counties, land is worth $9.72 per acre; in the non-manufacturing counties, $4.10 per acre. In Kentucky, in the manufacturing counties, $36.48 per acre; in the non-manufacturing counties, $12.21 per acre. In Massachusetts, in the counties where most manufacturing is carried on, $57.87 per acre; and in the other counties, where less manufacturing is carried on, $34.55 per acre. In New Jersey, which heads the list, in her manufacturing counties, $96.46 per acre; in her non-manufacturing counties, $60.55 per acre. In all the other States the contrast is equally striking. The fact that such difference exists in every State shows that the higher value of farm lands in the manufacturing districts can only be accounted for by the direct influence which manufactories have upon the price.

I ask to have inserted in my remarks the table prepared by Mr. Dodge showing the higher land values in manufacturing counties, having grouped the same by States, to be found on page 27 of his report.

Mr. Dodge also presents a convincing array of statistics showing that the price paid for farm labor is greater in the manufacturing States and districts, and increases in the country as the business of manufacturing increases. From his very able and instructive statement upon this question I extract the following:

The State of Ohio, with only 40 per cent. in agriculture, pays comparatively high wages for farm labor because of its relative scarcity. Thus the northern part of the State, with Cleveland, Toledo, and other manufacturing cities, averaged, in 1882, $25.96 per month. The western district, which is agricultural, with Cincinnati, Dayton, Springfield, and other manufacturing towns, averages $24.75. The eastern district has a larger agricultural element, and therefore a lower average, which is $22.65.

Kentucky furnishes a fine contrast with Ohio. A river dividing, one State with four-tenths in agriculture, the other with five-eighths, and most of the remainder commercial and professional rather than industrial, the average has been as follows:

|---|---|---|
| Ohio | $20 72 | $24 55 |
| Kentucky | 15 17 | 18 20 |

A part of this difference, a small part it may be conceded, comes from a larger proportion of negro labor.

Illinois has a large proportion of its non-agricultural population in the northern counties. Dividing the State by east and west lines into three belts, the same result is seen, with quite as much contrast as between Ohio and Kentucky:

|---|---|
| Northern district | $27 52 |
| Southern district | 19 87 |

Comparing Illinois, as a whole, with Missouri separated only by the Mississippi, with somewhat less diversification in industry and smaller interests in manufactures, yet with vastly more than Kentucky, the rates are as follows:

| States. | 1879. | 1882. |
| Illinois | $20 61 | $23 91 |
| Missouri | 17 59 | 22 39 |
| Kentucky | 15 17 | 18 20 |

In every State the rate of wages is affected favorably by the presence of manufactures, whatever other causes of difference may prevail.

He concludes as follows:

Assertions have been plenty that labor on the farms is not affected unfavorably by manufacturing depression, but here are facts, in perfect accord with all similar records from time immemorial, which disprove that fallacy and show that the farm laborer is indissolubly bound up with the general prosperity of all the industries, and must share the good or ill fortune of workers in every legitimate line of human effort.

I was very much interested in a speech made recently by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] on the educational bill, and I wish to refer to it for a moment. It rejoices me to know that manufacturing dependent on patented inventions is no longer to be confined to any one section of the country, but that it is extending to every State and every Territory. There is no jealousy on this subject in the State of Connecticut. We plume ourselves upon the fact that we take out more patents in proportion to our population than any other State, showing a pre-eminence in inventive skill which has been maintained continuously since the passage of the act of 1790. But we know that a patent taken out in Oregon, in Texas, or in South Carolina adds to the productive capacity of the whole country and to its aggregate wealth, and so we have no jealousy. We know that our prosperity is to be coincident with the general prosperity. If we can not hold our own in the manufacturing which we have heretofore carried on in the State of Connecticut we will invent new articles which will be wanted by the people of the United States; we will anticipate their wants; we will by our inventions create a demand for the articles which we can manufacture with profit; and so I rejoice when South Carolina appears to be flourishing in the matter of manufactures dependent upon invention. The Senator said:

Look at the matter of cotton manufactures, which, by the way, are exempted by the State from taxation for ten years from their establishment.

I am glad to see that the same liberal policy which has prevailed from the foundation of the Government to the present time in our national capacity is beginning to find its place in the State of South Carolina.

The increase in product in the three years is 170 per cent., and the increase in actual capacity is considerably more. This is astonishing, but it is the fact. There is no reason why the product of the South Carolina mills in 1890 should not be $27,000,000 to $30,000,000.

The number of spindles and looms in 1880 and 1884 is given below:

| | Spindles. | Looms. |
|---|---|---|
| 1884 | 195,112 | 3,652 |

And so the Senator goes on to give the increase in manufactures in the State of South Carolina—the manufactured products being as follows:

| 1860 | $8,615,105 |
| 1870 | 9,858,981 |
| 1880 | 16,738,008 |

I am glad to know that this increase in manufacturing, which means increase in the applications of the patented inventions of the country, is not confined to South Carolina, but is extending through all the other Southern and Western States, as I might abundantly show if I had time.

Need I say more? Are not the figures which I have given conclusive? There are other statistics which I have showing the related value of patents to manufactures, which I will ask the liberty to have incorporated as part of my speech.

Since 1840 nearly 300,000 patents have been granted, and to illustrate the progress of invention in different portions of the country attention is invited to the following table, which shows the relation between the patents granted and the population during the years 1840, 1860, and 1880:

| States. | 1840, one to every— | 1860, one to every— | 1880, one to every— |
|---|---|---|---|
| Eastern | 15,133 | 3,269 | 1,642 |
| Middle | 20,834 | 4,049 | 2,066 |
| Southern | 149,349 | 18,363 | 16,491 |
| Western | 98,821 | 12,357 | 5,002 |

A close examination of this table will disclose that the percentage of increase in 1880 over 1840 in the Western States is more than double that of any other section.

In connection with the last table the following is introduced, showing the manufacturing statistics of the States by groups:

Table showing the manufacturing statistics of the States by groups (1880).

I have also a table, prepared by the Patent Office, showing the number of patents issued in the years 1840, 1850, 1860, 1870, 1880, and 1883 in each State, and showing the number so issued in proportion to the population in each State, showing the growth of the patent system along the lines where the manufacturing growth of the country has taken place, and some other tables further illustrating the close relation of inventive skill to manufacturing, which I submit to the Senate.

I have the number of patents issued during the last fourteen years for each State in the Union, the number of manufacturing establishments in each State, the capital invested, and the value of manufactured products in each State. It will be seen that the capital invested and the manufactured products bear a close relation and proportion to the number of patents issued in those States.

The business of the Post-Office Department furnishes perhaps as reliable an index of the growth and prosperity of the country as can be gathered from any source, and some statistics are given showing the increase of the postal-service revenues and expenditures from 1840 by decades to 1880 and for the year 1882.

It will be remembered that the reduction of postage from its highest figure has taken place during this period. It should be noted, too, that the mailable matter of to-day is almost entirely the result of the use of patents, and that it is transmitted by methods substantially unknown in 1836.

Is it not apparent that every department of business, every pursuit of organized life, has been fed, nourished, and enabled to keep step in this wonderful march of progress by the patented inventions of the age?

Now, I want to say that three classes of men have made this possible—first, the inventors; second, the manufacturers; third, the skilled laborers; and by skilled laborers I mean not only the operatives, the mechanics who make the labor-saving machines, but the men who are educated to comprehend the operation of machines and processes.

I know that it is often acknowledged that the wonderful growth of the country to which I have adverted is the result of invention. I give inventors all the credit that belongs to them, but I want to say that the manufacturers of the country, that the artisans of the country have taken part in this wonderful development of its resources, its industries, its wealth, and its population equally with the inventors. It is the manufacturer who has furnished the capital, the enterprise to reduce these inventions to practical application; it is the cunning workmen in the factories that have applied these inventions. The invention of the telegraph was a vast conception, but it has required the manufacturer and the artisan to make that profitable to the country. If it were not for the shop hands and shops of this country there are Senators on this floor who could not go home at the close of this session and return here at the commencement of the next session. Senators who have no very great love for this patent system are here only as the result of it.

I may be told perhaps that in my classification I have omitted the agriculturists as one of the classes of men who have contributed largely to this progress. By no means. The agriculturist has become a skilled laborer in this country. He purchases a machine. He no longer toils with the rude implements of the past. I assert, without fear of contradiction, that without patents the agriculture of the present day would be impossible and that a large proportion of the agricultural lands of the country would be inaccessible. In 1878 we were fighting Indians and hunting buffalo in Dakota; to-day Dakota stands knocking at our doors for admission as one of the States of the Union with an alleged population of 300,000, and in the bill for its admission which is reported it is provided that the lands reserved now for school purposes, which six years ago were waste hunting-grounds, shall not be sold at less than seven dollars and a half per acre.

I do not believe the entire population capable of labor in this country could raise the cereal productions and get the surplus to a market without the use of the patents issued to our inventors. And right here, with reference to the relation of patents to agriculture, I desire to have read a very interesting statement in an article originally printed in the Princeton Review by Professor F. A. Walker, late Superintendent of the Census. It is published in the Statistics of Agriculture, volume 3 of the Census Report, commencing on the bottom of page 29. Let the Secretary read what I have marked.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Fifth. To ask what has been done mechanically to promote our agriculture is to challenge a recital of the better half of the history of American invention. Remarkable as have been the mechanical achievements of our people in the department of manufacturing industry, they have been exceeded in the production of agricultural implements and machinery, inasmuch as in this branch of invention a problem has been solved that does not present itself for solution, or only in a much easier shape, in those branches which relate to manufactures; the problem, namely, of combining strength and capability of endurance with great lightness of parts.

In no other important class of commercial products, except the American street carriage or field wagon, are these desired qualities so wonderfully joined as in the American agricultural machines, while the special difficulty arising from the necessity of repairs on the farm, far from shops where the services of skilled mechanics could be obtained, has been met by the extension to this branch of manufacture of the principle of interchangeable parts, a principle purely American in its origin. Through the adoption of this principle by the makers of agricultural machines, a farmer in the Willamette Valley of Oregon is enabled to write to the manufacturer of his mower or reaper or thrasher, naming the part that has been lost or become broken or otherwise useless, and to receive by return mail, third class, for which the Government rate will be only two or three shillings, the lacking part, which, with a wrench and a screw-driver, he can fit into its proper place in fifteen minutes.

All the agricultural machines of to-day are not originally of American invention, although most of them are, in every patentable feature; but I am not aware that there is at present in extensive use one which does not owe it to American ingenuity that it can be popularly used. Without the improvements it has received here, the best of foreign inventions in this department of machinery would have remained toys for exhibition at agricultural fairs or machines only to be employed on large estates under favorable conditions.

But more even than the ingenuity of inventors and manufacturers has been required to give to agricultural machinery the wide introduction and the marvelously successful applications it has had in the cultivation of our staple crops East and West. "Experienced mechanicians," says Professor Hearn, "assert that, notwithstanding the progress of machinery in agriculture, there is probably as much sound practical, labor-saving invention and machinery unused as there is used, and that it is unused solely in consequence of the ignorance and incompetency of the work people." This remark, which is perfectly true of England, and the force of which would have to be multiplied fourfold in application to the peasantry of France or Austria, utterly fails of significance if applied to the United States. It is because mechanical insight and aptitude, in the degree respecting which the term "mechanical genius" may properly be used, are found throughout the mass of the American people that these products of invention and skill have been made of service on petty farms all over our land, and in the most remote districts. Lack of mechanical insight and aptitude, in the full degree requisite for the economical use and care of delicate and complicated machinery, is almost unknown among our native northern people. Not one in ten but has the mechanical sense and skill necessary for the purpose.

But it has not been through the invention and wide application of agricultural machinery alone that the peculiar and extraordinary mechanical genius of our people has increased our national capacity for agricultural production. In what we may call the daily commonplace use of this faculty, throughout what may be termed the pioneer period, and in a diminishing degree through each successive stage of settlement and industrial development, the American farmer has derived from this source an advantage beyond estimation in dealing with the perpetually varying exigencies of the occupation and cultivation of the soil.

Mr. PLATT. Imagine, if you can, how we should reach our agricultural regions, the great wheat-fields of the West, without railroads; and I may say here that a railroad, from the steel rail to the top of the smoke-stack, from its locomotive head-light to the signal-lantern on the platform of the last car, is but one aggregation of patents. Think of the crops raised without improved plows, without seeders, without cultivators, without mowers, without harvesters, without threshing-machines! Think of the crops hauled to market by horses! Think, if it be possible, of the wheat converted into flour without patented milling processes! And say what proportion of profitable agriculture in this country is not due directly to patents and to the patent system of the country. The truth is, and there is no avoiding it, that you can not disconnect in this country invention, manufactures, and agriculture. The triumph and the success of the one is the triumph and the success of all. They are interdependent coequal factors as it were in producing our prosperity and our happiness; and so with regard to the other industries of the country patents are directly connected with them all and absolutely necessary to their successful pursuit. I will not stop to enlarge. I take coal mining, and ask you to imagine and tell me whether it can be carried on except by the use of patented inventions. Then gold and silver mining, furnishing one-half of the precious metals produced in the whole world, iron-producing, and if there be any other productive enterprise or occupation take away from it the factor of invention and tell me how much the diminished production will be.

Here I want to say one word with relation to the effect of patents and patented inventions upon the exporting capacity of the country. In the present state of the world's trade you must land your wheat, your corn, your cotton, and your other agricultural productions in Liverpool for as little money as the wheat and corn and cotton of any other part of the world can be landed there; you must compete with all systems of labor and production; and how is it that you are enabled to lay down your corn, your wheat, your flour, your provisions, in Liverpool as cheap as the wheat, the corn, the flour, the provisions of other countries can be sold there? It is simply because by the use of patented inventions you are able to produce them at a cost far less than they would have been produced under the old system, and that, too, while paying the laborer engaged in producing them much higher wages than are paid in any other land. That nation which gets most of the world's trade is to be the first power of the globe. Both patriotism and the interests of humanity impel us to say that the United States must have it. How is it to obtain it? It is to be obtained only by encouraging the inventive genius of our citizens by protecting the patent system of the country and all that is involved and comprehended in that system; and as we stimulate the inventive faculty and protect the patent system, we shall steadily reduce the cost of production in this country until we are able to compete with the world, no matter what may be its system of labor.

One striking fact can not be gainsaid or overlooked—each ten years of our last half-century has shown a marked reduction in the cost of all products and a marked increase in the compensation of labor, and such diminished cost of production and increased compensation of labor has been greater in the United States than in any other country.

The day when we shall have more of the world's trade than any other country is not so far distant as some may imagine. I want to read an extract from Mr. Gladstone's Gleanings of Past Years, in chapter 8, "Kin beyond sea:"

I do not speak of political controversies between them and us, which are happily, as I trust, at an end. I do not speak of the vast contribution, which, from year to year, through the operations of a colossal trade, each makes to the wealth and comfort of the other—nor of the friendly controversy, which in its own place it might be well to raise, between the leanings of America to protectionism, and the more daring reliance of the old country upon free and unrestricted intercourse with all the world; nor of the menace which, in the prospective development of her resources, America offers to the commercial pre-eminence of England. On this subject I will only say that it is she alone who, at the coming time, can, and probably will, wrest from us that commercial primacy. We have no title: I have no inclination to murmur at the prospect. If she acquires it she will make the acquisition by the right of the strongest; but in this instance the strongest means the best. She will probably become what we are now, the head servant in the great household of the world, the employer of all employed, because her service will be the most and ablest; we have no more title against her than Venice, or Genoa, or Holland has had against us. One great duty is entailed upon us, which we unfortunately neglect, the duty of preparing by a resolute and sturdy effort to reduce our public burdens in preparation for a day when we shall probably have less capacity than we have now to bear them.

Speaking of England and of the United States—

Again in the same article:

The development which the Republic has effected has been unexampled in its rapidity and force. While other countries have doubled, or at most trebled, their population, she has risen during one single century of freedom, in round numbers, from two millions to forty-five. As to riches, it is reasonable to establish from the decennial stages of the progress thus far achieved a series for the future; and, reckoning upon this basis, I suppose that the very next census, in the year 1880, will exhibit her to the world as certainly the wealthiest of all the nations. The huge figure of a thousand millions sterling, which may be taken roundly as the annual income of the United Kingdom, has been reached at a surprising rate; a rate which may perhaps be best expressed by saying that if we could have started forty or fifty years ago from zero, at the rate of our recent annual increment we should now have reached our present position. But while we have been advancing with this portentous rapidity America is passing us by as if in a canter. * * * There can hardly be a doubt as between the America and the England of the future that the daughter at some no very distant time will, whether fairer or less fair, be unquestionably stronger than the mother.

And in this connection I wish to read a single sentence from Mulhall's Progress of the World:

The increase of wealth—

Speaking of the United States—since 1850 would suffice to buy up the whole German Empire, with its farms, cities, banks, shipping, manufactures, &c. The annual accumulation has been £165,000,000, and therefore each decade adds more to the wealth of the United States than the capital value of Italy or Spain. Riches are more evenly divided than in Europe; few are very rich, fewer still indigent.

But this supremacy, this primacy of the world, is only to be reached through the field of invention. To those who believe that the center of the world's trade is to be moved from England to America in the near future, that its exchanges are to be moved from Threadneedle street to Wall street, I commend the careful, watchful guardianship of the patent system of the United States.

Now, I desire to speak a little about our productive capacity as enhanced by patents. We are a nation of 50,000,000 people, but we have the productive capacity of many more millions, how many more no man can estimate. Coal and water are now performing the work of human hands. What agents will perform them in the near future it is impossible to tell. The steam-power used in the manufactories of the United States, by the census of 1880, was equal to 2,183,488 horse-power; the water-power was equal to 1,225,379 horse-power; making in all the horse-power of the United States 3,408,867. Counting one horse-power to be equal to that of six men, we have the power used in the driving of our factories alone in this country the equivalent of the power of 20,453,202 men. The steam-power used in driving our factories, not including the water-power, is equivalent to the labor of 13,100,928 men; and of our 50,000,000 people only 35 per cent. are supposed to be capable of labor; in round numbers 17,500,000 laborers, persons capable of pursuing gainful avocations, in the country; and yet it would nearly take these 17,500,000 men to furnish the force that is exercised by steam in driving the engines of our factories, the wheels, the spindles, and the machinery of this country; and we do not begin to touch even then upon the saving of power by the use of the machines which are manufactured in these factories.

Take the capacity of locomotive engines as compared with the capacity of horses. I will read a single sentence from the argument of Mr. Coffin, a distinguished journalist of Boston, before a select committee of the House of Representatives in the Forty-fifth Congress, third session, relative to the causes of the general depression of labor and business in the United States. He says:

I come now to railway transportation. The Massachusetts railway reports for 1876 show 1,030 locomotives at work. One of our ablest engineers, Mr. Edward Appleton, has set himself to see what those locomotives would do when compared with the use of horses on common roads, and he estimates (after throwing out the locomotives that are used on tracks that are being repaired and in machine-shops) 682 locomotives in use, and that the work performed by them would be equal to 1,519,496 horses on common roads. Taking his formula and applying it to the locomotives of the United States, as given in Poor's Manual, we find that the locomotives in the entire country are doing the work of 29,676,960 horses on common roads.

But you only enter the vestibule of increased capacity by these figures. Remember that eight-tenths of the manufacturing of the country is dependant on patented processes. Take the statement cited the other day by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], in which he quotes from Mulhall's Progress of the World, a book from which I have already quoted, as to the capacity of the sewing-machine:

In effect, the adoption of machinery and steam has given mankind an accession of power beyond calculation. The United States, for example, make a million sewing-machines yearly, which can do as much work as formerly required 12,000,000 women working by hand. A single shoe factory in Massachusetts turns out as many pairs of boots as 30,000 boot-makers in Paris.

Mulhall here gives the total horse-power in comparison with steam as 13,071,000, the horse-power of the world dependent upon the use of steam, equivalent to about 78,000,000 men.

Take the loom and see what it has done in adding to the productive capacity of the country. I read again from Coffin's testimony before the Congressional committee. He says:

In those days the industries were carried on in the household. There was no industry for females except that of the spinning-wheel and the loom. I had the curiosity to ascertain just what a spinner could do in a day, and I sent up to New Hampshire to a sister of mine who used to be an expert spinner, knowing that she had a spinning-wheel and some rolls, and I had the exact measurement of the distance which she walked in spinning with a large wheel. A day's work of ten hours would enable her to spin 3.8 miles of thread, and she would walk nearly five miles in doing it. Now, in one of our manufactories you will see a girl of 15 minding a machine that spins 2,100 miles of thread in a day—a thread that would reach from Washington to California. In those days the woman who commenced with the spinning-wheel and loom to get her fitting-out when about to get married would have to spend many weary days in making her sheets. To-day she obtains them at 75 cents apiece. In those days there was no industry that females could turn their hands to except the spinning-wheel and the loom. They were utterly cut off from doing anything else except working in the field with the men.

Take the figures which I have given of the wool production and consumption of this country. In 1880 the wool grown was 290,000,000 pounds; that imported was 70,575,478 pounds. We exported 4,074,517 pounds, which left for home consumption in the United States 356,500,961 pounds of wool. Now, imagine for a moment what kind of a figure the mothers and daughters of the land would make in carding it with the old hand-cards, or spinning it with the old spinning-wheel, or weaving it with the old hand-loom. Take the single matter of cleaning cotton. I read again from Coffin's testimony:

Take another illustration. Under the old process of cleaning cotton, before the invention of the Whitney gin, a man could clean four pounds a day. The gins now in use clean 4,000 pounds a day. The cotton crop of this country last year—was estimated at 4,700,000 bales. It probably exceeded that. That would be 2,021,000,000 pounds. Under the old way it would have required 505,000,000 days' work at $1 per day (that is, $505,000,000) to clean cotton, a work which is done at present by 1,614 men working 313 days in the year, and costing not over $500,000.

Take the matter of manufacturing cotton, all of which is dependent upon patented inventions. The cotton-mills of the world make six million miles of cotton cloth every year, which would furnish a band to the moon seventy-five feet wide.

We need not go further with figures to show how inventions increase the productive capacity of the country. The whole laboring population of the country could not care for its cotton and its wool. I quote again from Mr. Coffin:

If you visit Garsed's manufactory in Philadelphia, you will find his engine doing with seven tons of coal the work of seventy thousand men. If we reckon seven tons of coal as costing $21, and the labor of seventy thousand men at $1 a day, then it is $21 as against $70,000 of expenditure saved in muscular effort. Does it throw men out of employment? Does it not liberate them from muscular toil? Does it not leave them to do something better and higher? Instead of employing their muscles they employ their brains.

Whenever a machine is invented which does the work of ten men with one attendant, nine men are released from that occupation in which they have theretofore engaged to engage in other productive operation. The men so released do not remain idle nor do they descend in the grade of labor.

I know the argument is often used that inventions are opposed to the labor interests of the country. It is not true. There is a redistribution of labor whenever a new labor-saving machine is invented, but there is no destruction of labor. There is no degradation of labor in invention. The man released from a particular kind of labor by the introduction of a labor-saving machine does not go down in the grade and scale of labor, but he ascends. He engages in some higher employment, in some more productive avocation, for patents elevate the laborer. New inventions open new fields of labor. Take printing, take photography, take telegraphy, take gas-making, take steam transportation—take all these fields of labor which have been positively created out of nothing by invention, and you will find that the man released from labor in some old occupation by the introduction of machinery which performs his work enters some of these or other new avocations, with increased compensation for his labor.

Again, the laborer who lives and breathes the air of invention produces more, man for man, than he who does not live in such an atmosphere, for patents are educators. Education, as was well remarked by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] in a recent speech, is something more than book-learning. It is knowledge in its widest sense. It is information; and for one I believe that the man who learns to operate a complicated machine acquires education of as much real value to himself and the race as the man who learns to conjugate Greek verbs. The man is a wiser man, a nobler man, who can make or operate a complicated machine than the man who can not. There is an education of the college. There is also an education of the factory and the field. We may not despise or neglect either. The man who is learned in the classics may not call him ignorant who without knowledge of the languages yet understands the practical application of mechanical principles or the improved processes of agricultural production.

What I have said is as true of the agricultural as of the mechanical. The farm hand who has become familiar with all the patented inventions relating to agriculture, with the machines which are to-day used in agricultural pursuits, can produce more, man for man, than the man living in Canada who has no conception of such a machine or the power to comprehend it or the ability to use it. We may go further. Compare the intelligent farm hand of the Western prairies with the peon of Mexico or the serf of Russia, and tell me which has the most productive capacity.

I desire once more to cite from Mr. Mulhall on this point some very interesting statistics, and I read from him rather than from American authors, because I desire to take the word of an Englishman upon these subjects. He has on page 55 a table showing the number of operatives in factories, together with the product of those factories and the product per operative in the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Russia, Austria, the Low Countries, Spain and Portugal, Italy, Scandinavia, the United States, and the British colonies. From this it appears that the factory operative in the United States produces, according to these statistics, £312 value per annum, which is about $1,560 per annum. The operative in Great Britain produces £224 value per annum, showing that the operatives in the manufactories of the United States produce about 40 per cent. more in value than the operatives in the manufactories of Great Britain. In France the excess of production in favor of the American operative is still larger. In Germany the value produced per operative is only £103 per annum, as against £312 for the operative in the United States; and, averaging all Europe, the operative in the United States produces just double in value to the operative in Europe. The full figures are:

| United Kingdom | £224 |
| France | 220 |
| Germany | 103 |
| Russia | 106 |
| Austria | 120 |
| Low Countries | 100 |
| Spain and Portugal | 119 |
| Italy | 108 |
| Scandinavia | 90 |
| All Europe | 156 |
| United States | 312 |

Why this difference, except because the operative of the United States has been educated by the patent system and by a knowledge of the patented inventions of the country?

I have already given the statistics of our patents since 1836. The total number to the issue which will be made on the 8th of April is 296,715.

I desire to put in here a table showing the patents issued in foreign countries:

| English patents, total to December 31, 1883 | 140,047 |
| English patents for year 1883 | 6,000 |
| German patents, total to December 31, 1883 | 26,084 |
| German patents for year 1883 | 4,848 |
| French patents, total to April 30, 1883 | 172,451 |
| French patents for year 1882 (1883 not received) | 6,269 |
| Italian patents, total to December 31, 1882, about | 13,560 |
| Italian patents, yearly | 1,250 |
| Belgian patents, total to December 31, 1882 | 60,043 |
| Belgian patents for year 1882 | 3,400 |
| Hungarian patents, total to December 31, 1882 | 20,434 |
| Hungarian patents for year 1882 | 2,377 |
| Austrian patents, total from 1853 to December 31, 1882, inclusive | 29,310 |
| Austrian patents for year 1882 | 2,377 |

Thus it will be seen that under the English patent system, which commenced in 1624, the total number of patents issued up to December 31, 1883, was only 140,047. France, whose patent system commenced in 1791, issued up to April 30, 1883, 172,451 patents. In the other countries given the number of patents issued is very much less than those I have referred to.

The factory in this country has become the school of the useful arts. Every valuable patent builds a factory, and every factory produces scores of patents; and so the invention and the practical education of our people goes on.

I desire for a few moments to consider the question of property in patents. There are some people, I am sorry to say, who have very little regard for this property—for the property right of the inventor and patentee. I think I will show that it is as sacred a property and as much entitled to the protection of the Government as any other species of property. Nay, more; I think I will show that it is a property which stands on a higher plane, and which, if there is any distinction between property, is of a higher character and order than any other property in this land. I wish here to quote, from the most recent and I think the best treatise on patents, published by a citizen of my own State, Mr. Albert H. Walker, of Hartford, Conn., what he says as to the right of property in patents. I will ask the Secretary to read it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 152. The right of property which an inventor has in his invention is excelled in point of dignity by no other property right whatever. It is equaled in point of dignity only by the rights which authors have in their copyrighted books. The inventor is not the pampered favorite or beneficiary of the Government or of the nation. The benefits which he confers are greater than those which he receives. He does not cringe at the feet of power nor secure from authority an unbought privilege. He walks everywhere erect and scatters abroad the knowledge which he created. He confers upon mankind a new means of lessening toil or of increasing comfort, and what he gives can not be destroyed by use nor lost by misfortune. It is henceforth an indestructible heritage of posterity. On the other hand, he receives from the Government nothing which costs the Government or the people a dollar or a sacrifice. He receives nothing but a contract which provides that for a limited time he may exclusively enjoy his own. Compared with those who acquire property by devise or inheritance, compared with those who acquire property by gift or marriage, compared with those who acquire property by profits on sales or by interest on money, the man who acquires property in inventions by creating things unknown before occupies a position of superior dignity. Even the man who creates value by manual labor, though he rises in dignity above the heir, the donee, the merchant, and the money-lender, falls in dignity below the author and the inventor. The inventor of the reaper is entitled to greater honor than his father who used the grain-cradle, and the inventor of the grain-cradle is entitled to greater honor than his ancestor who for a hundred generations had used the sickle. Side by side stand the inventor and the author. Their labor is the most dignified and the most honorable of all labor, and the resulting property is most perfectly theirs.

Lord Bacon gave the weight of his opinion to views somewhat similar to the foregoing. The following is a translation of one of his Latin paragraphs.

"The introduction of great inventions appears one of the most distinguished of human actions, and the ancients so considered it; for they assigned divine honors to the authors of inventions, but only heroic honors to those who displayed civil merit (such as the founders of cities and empires, legislators, the deliverers of their country from lasting misfortune, the quellers of tyrants and the like). And if any one rightly compare them he will find the judgment of antiquity to be correct; for the benefits derived from inventions may extend to mankind in general, but civil benefits to particular lands alone; the latter, moreover, last but for a time, the former forever."—Walker on Patents, 102, 103.

I know the author will excuse me if I endeavor to supplement his very terse and undeniable statement of the character and of the dignity of this property right with some ideas of my own. This property in patents is a property which contains within itself the principle of the reproduction of property, and that is a characteristic which attaches to no other species of property. Every patent has in it the germ of a new patent, which in turn is property. Like that marvelous creation of God, "the tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed," every patented invention contains the fruit of an invention yielding seed. For instance, the telegraph generated the telephone, and other motors are to be the progeny of the steam-engine. The children of the steam-engine are already born that shall grow up to perform their work more easily, more expeditiously, more cheaply than the parent invention.

The most significant word in the grant of a patent is that one word "improvement." Letters patent state that, "Whereas A B has presented a petition praying for a grant of letters patent for an alleged new and useful improvement," &c. Every patent is an improvement in more senses than one. It is an improvement on the particular machine or process to which it has reference, but it is an improvement in a broader and more far-reaching sense. It is an improvement of every man who uses it, in knowledge, in comfort, in strength, in power, in beneficence. It is, in a word, an improvement of humanity itself. It is well that that technical word is used in every grant of letters patent. It is property of a high character in that it is a property which springs from the human brain. Processes of the brain are at once the basis and measure of all values. I hear it said that value is created and is measured by labor, by muscular toil; that the intrinsic value of the gold dollar is what it costs the average man to dig it out of the earth. But value has a higher author than muscular labor. Man in savagery produces no wealth; he neither creates nor acquires property. The higher the citizen ascends in the subtle processes of thought the more wealth will be found in the country. The higher a race ascends in intellectual capacity, in the faculty of contrivance, in inventive skill and genius, the richer will the race be. Nature is one vast storehouse of wealth, but it is a locked storehouse, and the human brain alone can unlock it. Invention is the magic key. Men seek gold in the bowels of the earth, but it lies in the air, in light, in the gases, in electricity. It needs no enchanter's wand, no talismanic words to set it free—only the processes of thought.

Men in the olden time sought some substance which should turn all the baser metals to gold, so they imagined, and they spent weary lives in searching for the philosopher's stone. They narrowly missed what they sought. There was a substance which turns all things to wealth, but it lay within their own brain. That gray matter of the brain is mightier than the fabled philosopher's stone. The processes of thought which are going on within the cells of that matter alone produce wealth, and power, and greatness. Men sailed to the westward to find an El Dorado. They found it. The land was full of wealth; but they lacked the eyes to see the riches and the power to conquer and appropriate it. They sought an outward kingdom, but the kingdom of wealth and power lay all undeveloped within them.

Banish wealth, if you please, from this country, transfer all the available wealth of the land to Russia, make every man bankrupt, and leave the means of but six months' subsistence, and in a single generation we will reproduce this wealth of which we are so proud to-day. It would be simply the outcome of the human brain—simply wringing from nature her secrets by the inventive faculty of man.

Few men, I believe, have thought of the actual money-value of patents. The mind can not measure it. There are few data from which it can be estimated. We may perhaps gather some idea of the money value of patents by seeing what they have cost inventors. The unexpired patents to-day are 235,400, a somewhat larger number than I had supposed when I made the calculation which I am about to submit. I had taken 230,000 as the number of outstanding patents, and they have cost in Government fees $8,000,000; that is to say, the inventors have paid into the Treasury of the United States to obtain those patents $8,000,000. If you allow attorneys' fees at $50 each, there is $11,500,000 more. If you put the time in experimenting and the expense making models at $100 more, and that is vastly too small, it will be $23,000,000 more. So that you will have $42,000,000 as the cost of the title deeds which have been given to the inventors of this country that are now in force. But that is no measure of value. That is the first cost; that is the cost of obtaining. I know that it is difficult to put any average value upon patents; I know that some of them are worth millions, and some of them are worth nothing, but I think it would be safe to say that they are worth $500 on an average; and, if so, we have as the value of the patented inventions upon that basis, not reckoning cost, $115,000,000, the actual salable value. Others would put the average value of patents very much higher.

But this, after all, is no way to measure the value of patents. If we measure them by what they create, by what they save in cost, by what they add to production, by their multiplication of values, then the sum total is simply incalculable.

Let me give you an illustration or two of the saving of patents. I take perhaps as the most marked instance of the saving made by the use of patented inventions the Bessemer steel patent, and I want to say right here that I do not like to have it said that this is the invention of a foreigner alone. I want Americans and American inventors to have their rightful share of credit for this invention. The article known as Bessemer steel was an American invention. It was made by William Kelly, an iron-master of Eddyville, Ky., and in 1856 and 1857 the Patent Office, in an interference between him and Bessemer, decided that Kelly was the prior inventor. B. F. Mushet, of England, finally added a further improvement, which rendered it practicable. The first rail of it was laid on the Midland Railroad, in England, in 1857, merely as an experiment. The first works were established here in 1864–'65 at Wyandotte, under the Kelly patent, and in 1865 by Winslow, Griswold & Holley, at Troy. The Kelly, Bessemer, and Mushet patents were consolidated in 1866, and work began in 1868. Good quality was not produced until 1870, when the company producing it failed.

So much for the history of the Bessemer invention. In 1868 the average price of steel rails was $165 per ton. The price since the commencement of 1884 is $34 per ton. The production of steel rails in 1883 was 1,295,740 tons. The same quantity made in 1868 would have cost more than they cost in 1884 by $168,446,200. That is the saving of a single year as the result of this invention.

But when we have thus considered the saving in the cost of production we have just begun to consider the saving which is effected by this patent. The entire transportation question of the country has been affected by it. The life of a Bessemer steel rail is double the life of an iron rail; it is more than double, and it is capable of very much harder usage. Now take a single fact as suggesting the saving, aside from that of cost of the production of the steel rail, which has been effected by this patent. In 1868 the freight charge per bushel from Chicago to New York was by lake and canal 25.3 cents, by all rail 42.6 cents. In 1884 by lake and canal it is 9 cents only, and by all rail 17 cents only. Now take the 119,000 miles of railroads in the United States which are used in the transportation of merchandise. Apply that fact to the reduction of the cost of transportation, a large portion of which has resulted directly from the use of the Bessemer steel rail, and tell me if you can estimate, see if you can find the figures which will represent the saving to this nation by reason of the use of this one patented invention.

Let me take another illustration; and I do this because I hear that the barbed-wire patent has oppressed people; I hear that people who use it are unwilling to pay any royalty for the use of it, and so I cite this illustration to show the saving effected by patents. There have been made and sold from 1874 to 1882, inclusive, of barbed wire for fencing 459,805,000 pounds, which make equal to 1,379,806 miles of post-and-rail fence, or 110,384,480 rods. An old board-and-post fence costs $1 per rod, and the barbed-wire fence costs 50 cents per rod. Hence the actual saving to farmers already by this one invention is $55,192,240.

The total amount of fencing in the United States is estimated at 1,619,195,428 rods. At $1 per rod this would amount to as many dollars; whereas if we had had this invention and could have built all these fences of barbed wire at 50 cents a rod it would have saved the farmers of this country the enormous value of $809,597,714. I take as my authority for the cost of fencing an agricultural paper published in Iowa, the Iowa Homestead, and in this estimate nothing is included of the saving in the repairs of fences.

Take an illustration which has reference to the Patent Office, representing a smaller saving but no less forcible. Before the establishment of photolithography was applied to the production of copies of drawings in the Patent Office they were produced by tracing, costing from one to ten dollars each, and the party ordering them from three to twenty-five dollars each. By this process they now cost the Government about 1 cent each, and are sold to litigants and inventors for 10 cents, copies of which are constantly demanded by the courts in infringement and other patent cases. I merely speak of that as illustrative of the saving resulting from the use of patented machines.

This leads me to speak of the value of patents as measured by their effect in enhancing the value of their products. Here we have no data and every one must judge from his own standpoint and from his own opinion as to how much has been added to the wealth of this country which would not have been added to it except for our inventions and our patent system. How much has been added to the value of land which otherwise would not have been fenced, how much to the value of urban property consequent upon the improvement and development of farms; how many cities owe their existence to the production of the Bessemer steel rail; how much, to come home to our own city, of the $5 per square foot of land near the outskirts of Washington is due to patented inventions? These are suggestive inquiries. For my part, I believe that two-thirds of the aggregate wealth of the United States is due to patented inventions. Two-thirds of the $43,000,000,000 which represents the aggregate wealth of the United States, in my judgment, rests solely upon the inventions, past and present, of this country. The only way to test the opinion is by imagining the effect upon values which would follow a prohibition of the use of patented inventions.

Take the expired and unexpired patents; prohibit the application of steam to the creation of power; prohibit the use of patents relating to agriculture and the production of the cereals and of cotton; prohibit the use of the inventions relating to electricity; prohibit the use of inventions relating to printing, and tell me how much you have subtracted from the value of the property of this country? Tell me what the property of the country would be worth with such a prohibition? Then banish the knowledge of them, and tell me how this wealth is to be reproduced.

I would gladly speak here of the addition to our comforts and our enjoyments by the use of patented inventions, but I forbear. If we can conceive a situation in which we should live in a home in the building or fitting up of which no patent was employed; eat our family meal in the provision or preparation of which there was no invention; be clothed in apparel into the making of which no patent entered; ride to our business in a conveyance in the construction of which all patents were prohibited; read only such books and papers as were produced without the intervention of patented machinery, we may realize partially how much of our social and domestic happiness is derived from patents.

I wish in this connection to submit, without reading, the number of patents granted, classified as relating to different arts, occupations, and branches of industry:

We protect all our personal property by patents, we lock it up with patented locks, and if anybody breaks through and steals our treasures we overtake the thief by a patented telegraph. We defend our national honor by patents. We heard only yesterday that an unfortunate riot occurred in one of our principal cities. It was the telegraph which summoned the troops of the State to Cincinnati; it was that subtle force, so intangible, impalpable, invisible that we scarcely know whether it is material or spiritual, which the inventive genius of man has reduced to servitude, which in an instant's time summoned soldiers from all sections of Ohio to the defense of Cincinnati.

Take another instance: Many believe, I fully believe, that Ericsson, a foreigner, but I think an American citizen, by a single invention changed the whole theory of naval architecture, the naval warfare of the world, and prevented this country from dismemberment and disunion. That single invention, originating in the brain of an humble individual, whose invention was not favored by the Government, and who was never to my knowledge compensated by the Government, changed the history of the whole world. Consider this one instance of the effect of patents and tell me what is the value of patented inventions, and what they have added to the value of property in this country?

A distinguished member of the Army told me within a short time that the only reliance of this country in case of war was upon the inventive genius of its people, that it had no navy, that it had no sufficient army, that it could only defend itself by a special exercise of the inventive faculty of its citizens in calling into immediate use and power new implements of warfare.

Is not this vast system of property worth protecting? Does not the patent system attain a dignity which entitles it to fair and generous treatment? Is it not large enough to be independent?

I have heard it said that we should have all these inventions anyway; that men would have invented without regard to the encouragement which was given to them by our patent laws; that if this exclusive use of their inventions had not been secured to them for a term of years, that if their property in patents were not protected, yet they would have gone on and will go on inventing all the same; that there has been in some way a marvelous birth in this country of inventive capacity, and that it must grow whether it is protected or not.

Mr. President, it is not true. The inventor is no more a philanthropist than is the agriculturist. He works for his support. He works to achieve a competency. He invents, if you please, to become rich; but he is no more a philanthropist than any other man in any other walk or avocation of life, and you have no right to demand of him that he shall be a mere philanthropist. He is entitled to his reward. He is a laborer entitled to his hire, entitled to it more if possible than any other laborer, as his labor is higher in dignity and grandeur than that of any other laborer. I wish on this point to call attention to the testimony of Sir Henry Bessemer as I find it on page 103 of a work called Creators of the Age of Steel. I ask the Secretary to read it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Sir Henry Bessemer is a believer in patents; but to his varied experience in the introduction of new inventions, another single fact has to be added. "I do not know," he says, "a single instance of an invention having been published and given freely to the world, and being taken up by any manufacturer at all. I have myself proposed to manufacturers many things which I was convinced was of use, but did not feel disposed to manufacture or even to patent. I do not know of one instance in which my suggestions have been tried; but had I patented and spent a sum over a certain invention, and saw no means of recouping myself except by forcing, as it were, some manufacturer to take it up, I should have gone from one to the other and represented its advantages, and I should have found some one who would have taken it up on the offer of some advantage from me, and who would have seen his capital recouped, by the fact that no other manufacturer could have it quite on the same terms for the next year or two. Then the invention becomes at once introduced, and the public admits its value; and other manufacturers, like a flock of sheep, come in. But the difficulty is to get the first man to move. The first man might say: 'Oh, my machinery cost me a great deal of money; I have my regular trade, and this new scheme is sure to be more trouble to me in the first instance; and when everybody asks for it, every other manufacturer will be in a condition to supply it; so it is not worth my while.' I believe inventions which are at first free gifts are apt to come to nothing."

Mr. PLATT. The universal testimony of all inventors is that it is the reward which they hope to secure which stimulates their efforts. Is it so that an inventor of all the men in the world has no right to his reward? Is it so that he has no right to be protected in his property? It is the security to an inventor of his invention which makes it valuable and which stimulates him in his effort to make new inventions.

I have heard it argued that we had approached the perfection of the patent system, that there were no new worlds to conquer, that nature had no more secrets to bestow upon mankind for their benefit. So far from this being the case, we stand but in the very vestibule of the great storehouse of nature's secrets. We have but gathered a few pebbles along the shore on which beats a limitless sea. There is no limit to the evolution of human invention until it reaches the realm of the infinite. It requires no prophet's vision to see the coming glory and the coming triumph of the inventive skill of man.

Take but an instance or two of what is outlined on the horizon of the near future—the transmission and adaptation of electrical force, the combustion of water or its constituent elements, the application of compressed air. The whole inventive world is stirred to-day, stimulated, to find some new motive power. I saw in this city within a day or two a six-horse-power engine which had been running for months ten hours a day, driving the machinery in a machine-shop, the only agent for the driving of which was a little jet of illuminating gas scarcely larger than that which we burn in a single burner, introduced into a cylinder in connection with common air. It has been run here in the city of Washington, where gas is $1.75 a thousand feet, at a very much less cost than the cost of a steam-engine of equal power; and I am told that in one of the cities of Massachusetts more than five hundred of these gas-engines are in operation, where the gas is supplied at about 50 cents per thousand feet. I am not certain about the fact, but I am so informed. Certain it is that cheaper motors are to be discovered; certain it is that we have not begun to discover the secrets of electrical force. We live in a wonder-land. The miracle of yesterday is the commonplace of to-day. The dream of the present is to be the fact of the immediate future.

No, Mr. President, every round of the ladder on which we have climbed to national pre-eminence is a patented invention, and every sign-board which points to a greater future of achievement and progress shows that the path continues to lead through the field of invention. We are nearing the end of the contest to which our fathers invited us when they gave to our Government the power to promote the progress of science and the useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries. That contest was for the supremacy of the world, and the prize is now in full view. Shall we forget, shall we neglect the system which has enabled us to outstrip our competitors in the race, or shall we the rather perfect and develop it, that through its perfection and development we may attain still grander results? We stand to-day in the gateway of a most marvelous future. Let us hope that eyes may be given us to see that the inscription over the gate reads, "Protection to the American patent system and all that it comprehends and involves."

Mr. President, I leave this branch of my subject. I have but suggested where I desired to elaborate. It is as fascinating as an oriental romance, a fairy tale, and the temptation to enlarge is very great, but there are some more practical considerations which I must present in support of this bill.

I say that the Patent Office should be made an independent Department, not only because of the vast importance of the interests which it must care for, but because of the treatment which it has received and must continue to receive so long as it remains a subordinate branch of the Interior Department.

In the first place, the Interior Department is overburdened; it is overloaded. No one man can discharge its duties properly. Let us see what the Secretary of the Interior has to do. He is charged with the supervision of the public business relating to patents for inventions; pension and bounty lands; public lands, including mines; the Indians; education; railroads; the public surveys; the census when directed by law; the custody and distribution of public documents; supervision of elecmosynary and literary institutions in the District of Columbia. He also exercises certain powers and duties in relation to the Territories.

Now take just three branches of the Interior Department—take the public lands, the railroads and their relations to the public lands; take the Indian Department—and tell me whether any one man can fairly discharge the duties which pertain to those three branches of his Department. Think of the multiplicity of important cases which must come to him for his personal decision. Think of the vast property interests which are to be decided in the mineral cases, the land cases, the railroad cases, which should receive his personal attention. In addition to all other duties he has the appointment and supervision of over 3,300 persons, and the executive administration of a Department which employs more than 3,300 agents.

If the Secretary of the Interior had as many heads as the Hindoo divinity Siva, and as many arms as Briareus, he could not personally perform all the duties pertaining to his office that would be most acceptably performed if he could give them personal attention.

Second, the duties which must be performed by the Secretary of the Interior in other branches of the Department always have led, and probably always will lead, to the selection for its head of a man who has no special adaptation for the important work of the Patent Office. Public opinion demands that the Secretary of the Interior must have defined ideas relating to the Indian policy; that he must have a knowledge of the laws relating to public lands; that he must understand the operation of the railroads in their relation to the Government; that he must have a Territorial knowledge which will enable him to administer so far as his duty requires the affairs of the Territories. He must have been trained in a different school from the man who should be selected for Commissioner of Patents or for the head of the Patent Department. Let me illustrate.

If the Secretary of the Interior is to be the superior officer, he must pass on questions of administration which he can not so well understand as the Commissioner. Under the practice of the office he passes on most complicated questions affecting the right to inventions. There has been no Secretary of the Interior within my knowledge who has had any special adaptation to that office, who has been selected at all with reference to his mechanical judgment or mechanical skill, or because of his superior understanding of the complicated questions of patent law.

Now, what is the practice of the office? Here is the Commissioner. Under him is a board of examiners-in-chief, with twenty-four principal examiners and four assistants to each principal. Now there comes an application for a patent involving some question of mechanical principle, involving nice questions of priority of invention, of utility, of practice under the patent law. The application goes first to the principal examiner. He is supposed to be a man skilled in the arts, who has a thorough knowledge, special knowledge, technical knowledge of the division of the Patent Office which he oversees. He passes upon it. If rejected, an appeal is taken to the examiners-in-chief, three men who are selected, or ought to be, for their extensive knowledge and experience in patent matters, who have a universal knowledge, so to speak, of inventions and of mechanical principles. If rejected there an appeal may be taken to the Commissioner, and by the practice of the office an appeal may be taken from the Commissioner to the Secretary of the Interior.

Tell me if a Secretary of the Interior, selected because he has some idea of the political administration of the Government, because he has knowledge relating to the Indian tribes, because he has knowledge of the land laws of the United States, is the person to pass upon that patent question and to reverse the action of the Commissioner, based upon the action of the chief examiners and the principal examiner; and yet it is done in practice frequently.

I say, without any disrespect to any Secretary of the Interior, past or present, that he can not be so well qualified to decide important questions involving mechanical principles and patent law as the subordinates whose decisions he must review. If it were so that the Secretary could personally decide all appeals from the decision of the Commissioner there would be less inconsistency in the situation, but I think it will be found that many appeals from the well-considered action of the Commissioner are reviewed and practically decided by a clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, who is known as the "patent and miscellaneous clerk."

There should be but one head. The office is double-headed now. I wish I had time to refer fully to the law to show to what extent there is a double administration of the Patent Office. One or two references must suffice. Under the law the principal examiners, assistant examiners, heads of divisions, clerks, and all employés are appointed by the Secretary of the Interior upon the nomination of the Commissioner. The power of appointment, except as controlled by civil-service rules, should be in the head of the Patent Office alone. He now may nominate. He is the best judge of the special qualifications required in the appointee, but he can only nominate. How little this power of nomination may influence appointments can be easily imagined. I once heard a Commissioner of Patents say that during his whole term, and it was not a very short one, not a single appointment was made in the Patent Office that he desired. He nominated men whom he thought best to fill the position with, but was in every instance given to understand that the nomination of some one of whom he knew nothing about would be agreeable to the Secretary. I ought in justice to say that this statement has no reference to the present Secretary.

The rules and regulations for the conduct of proceedings in the Patent Office are to be approved by the Secretary, and the Secretary is not unfrequently asked to overrule the action of the Commissioner in respect both to the making and application of rules. The Secretary of the Interior may overrule the Commissioner if he refuses for any cause to recognize an attorney or solicitor. Notwithstanding the office is self-supporting, all disbursements must be made by the disbursing clerk of the Secretary. The Commissioner can not order the purchase of a board to be used in reproducing a model called for in the trial of a cause without the approbation of this clerk. It needs no argument to prove that both the efficiency and independence of the Commissioner must be impaired by this complexity of administration.

What should be the qualification of the head of the Patent Office? He should combine an accurate and almost universal knowledge of mechanical principles with a thorough knowledge of patent law and with rare executive and administrative ability. He should be pre-eminently distinguished for these qualities. His position should be one of entire independence. It is more judicial than executive. His duties are more like those of a judge of a court than an executive officer; they are purely judicial and ministerial. The office should be permanent and it should be non-political, by which I mean it should have no political significance.

One of the great defects of the Patent Office has been that the Commissioner of Patents has felt, if not that he was in a position of degradation, he was not in a position of independence. He has felt that he has been overruled—to use perhaps not a very elegant phrase, snubbed—in the administration of his office. I do not speak of the present Commissioner or of the present Secretary of the Interior. I speak of my knowledge of the administration of the office in past years.

So we have had Commissioners who have only been there for two or three years. The moment that they became adapted to discharge well the duties of their office they left and went into more lucrative occupation, and used the knowledge which they had acquired to obtain practice as patent attorneys or solicitors. It has been understood throughout the country that the office of Commissioner of Patents was accepted with its present salary and with the limitations upon it simply as offering a stepping-stone to lucrative practice outside of the office after the Commissioner should resign.

The Commissioner should have salary enough to make him feel that he was occupying an office both of dignity and profit, and the salary and dignity should be at least equal to that of a circuit judge.

Every year's experience adds greatly to the capacity and ability of the Commissioner of Patents. In a word, the Patent Office needs and demands better administration, and it never will have it as a rule until it shall be made a separate Department. It must be held in entirely different estimation by Congress and by public sentiment before it will be what it ought to be. The way to secure this estimation by Congress, the way to secure for it what it wants and what it needs and what it must have if it is properly to discharge the high functions which devolve upon it, is to separate it entirely from any supervision by the Secretary of the Interior, to make it independent and dignified.

Third. It has been sadly neglected in the past. It must be enlarged and made more efficient, and this never will be as long as it remains simply a fifth-wheel of the Interior Department coach.

Now, I wish to say a few words as to the ways in which its efficiency can be promoted. And I urge with emphasis that it must have more force and more room. I quote now from Mr. Burke's report as far back as 1848:

Thus have I, in five separate communications to Congress and its appropriate committees within the last two years, made full expositions of the embarrassed condition of this office growing out of its greatly increased and increasing business, and the inadequacy of its force to perform its duties.

In view of these facts, I am confident that the Patent Office can not be held responsible for the embarrassments and delays which exist in one of the branches of its service. I am conscious that the inventors by whose contributions this important institution is sustained have grievous cause of complaint on account of the disappointments and injuries which they suffer from the delays which their business is compelled to encounter in the Patent Office, but I am confident their enlightened liberality will appreciate the earnest and persevering efforts which have been made by the undersigned to remove the just causes of their complaints, and that they will patiently wait the action of Congress for their relief, which, it is gratifying to know, may be confidently anticipated before the close of the present session.

The question of room for the Patent Office is becoming more and more serious every day. At the present time the working force is greatly crowded, and we are compelled to occupy rooms under ground, and with necessarily very imperfect ventilation. The health of many employés has been very seriously impaired and the work of the office greatly impeded. Since I have been in the office, now less than two years, eight persons have died, whose deaths were attributable, probably, to the occupancy of rooms unfit for such purposes. The files and the documents of the office are crowded into such small and inconvenient spaces as to be very difficult of access and very damaging to the files themselves. When additional rooms can be furnished for the working force of the office, those now unsuitable for occupancy by employés can be fitted for receiving the office files. I earnestly hope that some provision may be made whereby the work of the bureau may have sufficient room to be promptly and properly executed.

Let me call attention to what the present Commissioner said in his report last January:

I can not refrain from repeating what Mr. Commissioner Marble said in regard to the rooms occupied by the bureau. They are inadequate. I am compelled to keep valuable documents and records piled on the floor; some are in rooms so damp that the papers are moldy.

Many of the employés occupy small, dark, and damp rooms, and in numerous cases their health has been seriously impaired. Within a few years the entire building now occupied by the Department of the Interior will be required by this office for the proper accommodation of its force and the safe-keeping of its records and files.

I have a statement made this year by the Commissioner of Patents to the Committee on Appropriations, which I ask the Chief Clerk to read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Pending consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill by Congress the urgent needs of the Patent Office are herewith respectfully presented to the Committee on Appropriations.

There has been a remarkable increase of inventive activity during the last few years, which brings a corresponding increase of work to the Patent Office, and makes the labor more arduous.

Owing to the progress of the country, the great increase in population and wealth, the widespread rise and growth of new industries, more weighty interests, both of inventor and of manufacturer, are now at stake, and these are in a great measure dependent upon the thoroughness and accuracy of the work of the Patent Office.

In pursuing their labors the examining corps of the Patent Office must not only compare pending applications with each other, adjudicating between them where they conflict, but they must compare each application for a patent, for a design patent, or for the registration of a trade-mark or label, with patents and publications that have gone before, and apply all the tests of patentability established by law and by decisions founded in a long course of experience, the doctrines of combination, of aggregation, of mechanical skill, double use, new application, &c., as to the relations which these bear individually or in the aggregate upon the application or case under consideration.

Knowledge, judgment, skill, experience, and industry are indispensable requisites.

But with all human knowledge, with all human judgment, skill, and experience, with all human industry and perseverance, human capacity is limited.

The increase in the field to be explored causes more than a direct ratio of increase in the labor to be performed. The increase rather resembles the rule of geometrical progression.

The yearly number of applications now to be examined, including caveats, trade-marks, and labels is more than 39,000, nearly 40,000; and with amendments, arguments, appeals, interferences, and the various interlocutory questions raised by the able lawyers who have engaged in patent practice as a specialty, the labor and correspondence in the course of the examination of applications for patents, &c., is immense.

In 1848, when the grade of examiner was established, the total number of American patents was not over 6,000, and of English patents only about 12,000. These with such publications as were accessible at that time, there being only one alcove of books, about 1,000 volumes in the scientific library, constituted substantially the whole field over which search had to be made for anticipation of any alleged new device.

At the present day the number of American patents is nearly 300,000, and that of the English patents over 140,000.

As late as 1879 the number of English patents was only about 110,000.

The number of French patents published was only about 100,000.

The number of German patents was only 4,390.

The number of Belgian patents was about 47,000.

The number of books in the scientific library for consultation, including periodicals, &c., was not more than 29,000.

Now let this be compared with the present field:

As already said, the number of American patents alone is now nearly 300,000, and the increase per year is at the rate of about 21,000.

The number of English patents at the end of 1883 was 140,047, and the increase is about 6,000 a year.

The number of French patents published up to December 31, 1883, was about 172,000. The increase is about 6,000 a year.

The number of German patents at the end of 1883 was 26,084. The increase is about 5,000 a year.

The number of Belgian patents up to the end of 1883 was 60,043. The increase is about 3,500 a year.

The number of Italian patents up to April 30, 1882, was about 13,500. The increase is about 1,250 a year.

In addition there are thousands of Canadian, Austrian, New Zealand, Norwegian, and Spanish patents, together with patents of some other countries in be consulted. While the total number of volumes in the library up to December 31, 1883, was 41,322.

A moment's consideration of these figures, and of the nature of a thorough examination into the legal and patentable novelty, will suffice to show the enormous growth in the labor of examination within the past few years and its constant increase, and would of itself indicate the absolute necessity for an increase in the force of the Patent Office.

But to make this perhaps the more apparent the following tables are presented to serve as a graphic illustration.

These tables will give some idea of the work to be done, but they do not show the same fully, for they do not give the thousands of caveats (2,741 in 1883), the thousands of trade-marks and labels (1,849 in 1883) to be examined, nor the appeals, the various motions, and the interferences which have to be considered and decided; nor can they indicate the immensely increased field of labor. The field of the past compared with that of the present is like a mere garden plat compared with the vast wheatfields of Dakota.

Reports from the examiners show the work of the examing corps in the various divisions to be from two to eight months behind (that is, in some divisions of invention an application for a patent can not be taken up for consideration in less than eight months from the time it is received in the division), and this notwithstanding the fact that the examining corps as a rule is composed of capable, energetic, and industrious men, who work many hours beyond the time prescribed.

To assist the examining corps large drafts have had to be made upon other divisions of the office, and the consequence is that these divisions are likewise behind in their work.

To bring the work of the Patent Office up and keep it so for the present there should be added to the present force four principal examiners, six first assistants, ten second assistants, fifteen third assistants, twenty-five fourth assistants, all males; in all, sixty individuals.

Mr. PLATT. The quotations which I have made from former Commissioners and the letter of the present Commissioner are but the echo of the plea of every Commissioner of Patents from the commencement of the office down to the present time. The universal cry has been for more room, for more force, for room and force to enable the office to keep up with its constantly increasing business. It has been more than a cry, it has been a wail. The office is shamefully and almost criminally limited and cramped for room. There are 1,000 employés in the Patent Office building, 471 of whom only belong to the Patent Office. The area occupied by the Patent Office for clerical purposes aggregates 22,113 square feet, or 53 square feet to each employé, excluding messengers, laborers, &c. No allowance has been made for passageways and space required for going from one part of the room to another part of the same room. That is a little more than 7 feet square; it is 6 by 9. I have here a diagram of some of the rooms of the Patent Office, and by no means the worst-crowded rooms, showing how they are occupied. I hope that the process of photolithography will enable it to be produced in time to go into my speech to-morrow. Senators can examine it at their leisure. [For diagrams see opposite page.]

I undertake to say that if there were tenement-houses in the city of Washington crowded as the rooms in the Patent Office are crowded there would be one universal cry of indignation going up not only from the press of this city but the press of the whole country. Yet in the Patent Office it goes on and nobody objects. The space which is allotted to the clerical employés of the Patent Office may be large enough for a dungeon, it may be large enough for a tomb, and it may be a little too large for a grave, but it is not a fit amount of room for a human being to live and do the work of this Government in.

I wish to read a few words from the report of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] from the Committee on Public Lands, of April 3, 1882, to the Senate. The committee was called upon to investigate the Land Office and see whether the clerks there had room enough. The Land Office is in the same building. The report says:

From these statements a full understanding of the actual condition of the General Land Office and of the Interior Department building can be obtained. The committee agree that the Interior Department edifice is incapable of properly accommodating the Patent Office, the Bureau of Indian Affairs, and the General Land Office, and that these difficulties and embarrassments are increasing rapidly.

The want of sufficient room, light, and ventilation is very damaging to the health of the employés, and greatly delays them in their work, causing a serious loss of time and efficiency in their service. It also exposes the most valuable papers and records to theft and to great danger from fire, and has already caused the destruction of many of them by mold and decay and by the ravages of insects and vermin.

Mr. Lockwood, the chief clerk, says:

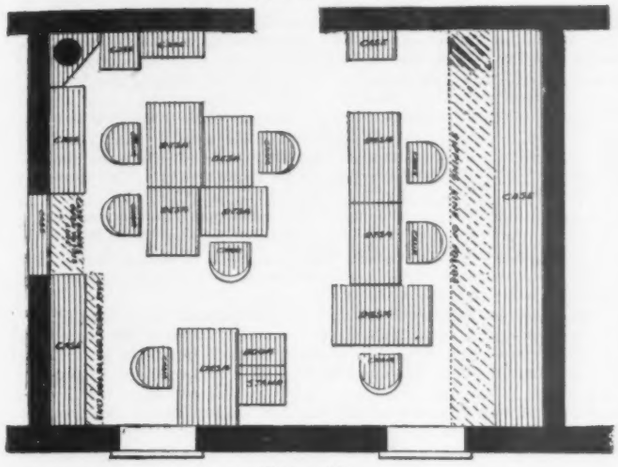
Aside from the question of injury to the service by a separation of the force and records is the question of the health of the employés, who are so close together that it is frequently impossible to work to advantage. In the accounting division of the Indian Bureau, for instance, there are eight or ten people all crowded together in one room, and there is necessarily so much going on in the nature of conversations and passing to and fro that the public business is seriously interfered with. Some of the employés of the Land Office are occupying part of the model-halls of the Patent Office, a place never intended to be used for such purposes. The necessity, however, of the accommodation of this force was upon us, and we had to do it. I consider it bad policy to have the records of any office located in the hallways for various reasons. In the first place, they are damaged to a great extent by rats and other vermin. In many cases the original records and files of the Patent Office have been almost wholly destroyed, and can not be replaced. There are numerous other reasons which will occur to the committee why there should be room for people to perform their duties and for the proper care of the records. I have made a computation of the number of square feet occupied by each employé of the Department in the Land, Patent, and Indian Offices, and the highest number, I think, was about 8, and the lowest about 5, square feet.

I suppose it is a misprint for 5 feet square.

I have visited the Patent Office, and I undertake to say that if any Senator will go there and see where the clerks are performing their duties, will see where the most skilled experts of this country, with the best scientific attainments, are performing their duties, down in the rooms which until it became absolutely necessary to have more space were used only for coal-cellars, huddled together where the sunlight rarely or never shines in the room, where there is little or no ventilation, and where the air is so foul that I venture to say no Senator can stay an hour without becoming nauseated and sick, I think he would have little doubt that something should be done not only to increase the efficiency of the office, but to prevent the almost barbarous treatment of its employés. I speak strongly, but I think no more so than the occasion demands. Yet notwithstanding all this cry for more room and more force, since this report was made in 1882 showing that there could be no more persons crowded into that building, the force of the Land Office has been increased thirty, the force in the Indian Office three, and to make room for them the force in the Patent Office has been decreased twenty-one.

As a matter of course the Patent Office is sadly behind in its work. In the division of chemistry they are eleven weeks behind; in textiles, seven months; in dairy, fences, tobacco, &c., five months. In hydraulics and pneumatics, four and a half months; in harvesters, eight and a half months. If a man produces an invention which will save one-tenth, one-quarter, or one-half the cost of harvesting the entire crop of the West, he can not get his application considered under eight months in the Patent Office by reason of the want of force. In fine arts, apparel, &c., the office is four months behind; in printing, binding, and paper manufacture, seven and a half months; in civil engineering, three and a half months; in household furniture, five months; in heating, illuminating, and drying, four and a half months; in electricity three months; in metal work, three and a half months. These are a few of the divisions of the office. Others are not so far behind, but scarcely any of them are able to keep up with current applications.

Whenever more clerical force has been applied for, the answer which I have heard has been, first, want of room, and second, economy. There never will be room enough until it is made a separate Department. These other branches and divisions of the Interior Department will crowd upon it and crowd it down, as they have done in the past. As for economy, I have shown that the Patent Office has been and is still a supplicant. It begs for what it should have as a right, and then it seldom gets what it begs for. I have shown that it has been crowded into the coal-holes and the basement, where foul gases and impure odors destroy health, and where work must be inadequately performed.



Would you think that this "pauper whom nobody owns" is the only self-sustaining branch of this Government, the only branch or bureau of the Government that pays its way? It has paid all its expenses and has a fund to its credit to-day of $2,727,107, not including, as I believe, the amount that Congress took from its fund to help pay for the building into the basement and coal-cellars of which it has been largely crowded. That would swell its surplus to over $3,000,000.

I said it had a surplus fund. I should have said it did have a surplus fund once; it controlled the surplus fund once; but in such poor estimation was it held that its fund was taken away from it by public law, and to-day and for years past it has had to pay day by day its earnings into the Treasury of the United States, the surplus to be used for the benefit of the other departments of the Government. Surplus no longer exists in practice; and nevertheless let me say the inventors of this country feel as if that Patent Office building belonged to them. They built it. It was built for them. They have more than paid for it. They can pay for it to-day out of the surplus fund of the Patent Office and still have a surplus. More than $1,500,000 has been paid into the Treasury by inventors on rejected applications alone.

I undertake to say that visitors who come here from foreign lands and from distant parts of our own country have no idea but what that building is exclusively used, or nearly so, by the Patent Office. They have no idea that there are over five hundred other clerks within the building, and that its poorest part is assigned to the Patent Office.

The truth is, the Patent Office has been crowded into the kitchen of the house it built, it has been made to eat with the servants, and the other bureaus of the Department sit in the parlors and regale themselves with the delicacies of the family table.

The system of examination should be greatly improved. The value of the patent system depends largely upon a more thorough examination of the applications. The statement of the Commissioner read by the Chief Clerk shows how impossible it is to make any careful examination of the applications which are made. I have heard within the last week of the case of an application for a patent involving a new process, if it be patentable, a process which will largely revolutionize certain branches of business in the country, a process about the patentability of which the inventor had serious doubt, his attorney had serious doubt. All the examination that that application received was such as was given to it when it was referred by the principal examiner in the morning to one of the assistant examiners, and before noon was passed upon affirmatively, and the order to issue a patent made. Such hurried, incomplete examinations are simply unavoidable. The examiners can not give the time to the examination of applications which care requires.

As I said, the future utility and benefit of the patent system depends largely upon a more rigid examination of applications. It is the duty of the Patent Office to see that patents are not improperly issued as well as to see that patents are properly issued. It is the duty of the Patent Office to so examine the applications as that no title-deed to an invention will be given to an applicant if he is not actually and truly the first and original inventor of a useful improvement; and I venture to say this never will be done until the Patent Office is made an independent Department. I venture to say that so long as it obtains its supplies, its moneys, through the grace of the Secretary of the Interior it never will have sufficient force to examine patents properly or have sufficient room for the examiners to work in.

What is the result of a want of careful examination? The result is, first, that the public is imposed upon. In the second place, that patentees have to become litigants to determine their rights. This is a matter which has been frequently urged by Commissioners, and I ask especially to refer to the report of Commissioner Leggett in 1873 at page 9:

> It is well known that complaints from many sections of the country against our whole patent system arise almost exclusively from patents that are improperly granted, because of the want of proper supervision in their examination; and with so many persons examining and passing applications for issue, it is an impossibility to establish anything like a uniformity of practice in the office or to get any such supervision as will attain what the law is intended to secure—that is, the rights of the inventor without infringing upon the rights of the public.

I also call attention to the present Commissioner's report with reference to the increase of the salaries of the examining force, an absolute necessity if the services of men having the knowledge capacity required to discriminate in the granting of patents are to be retained:

> I concur in what my predecessor said in his report, dated September 14, 1883, to the honorable the Secretary of the Interior in regard to salaries. The examining corps in this bureau should be composed of men of first-class ability and undoubted integrity. It is of consequence to inventors and to the people at large that patents should not be improvidently issued. The examining corps must, in the main, be relied upon to prevent this. Not one patent in fifty comes under the personal supervision of the Commissioner or his assistant. The examiners determine these important questions in the first instance, and in a great majority of cases first and finally. The Government, I submit, can afford (especially when inventors provide the funds) to pay as full compensation for first-class ability and strict integrity as a private individual or corporation. The experience of the office is that it is next to impossible to secure, with the hope of retaining for more than a short period, assistant examiners whose thorough fitness renders them especially valuable to the service. They are constantly leaving to accept more lucrative employment outside. Since every conceivable advantage is on the side of just, not to say liberal, compensation, I trust it may please Congress to adopt the suggestions of my predecessor and provide the increase of salaries indicated in the estimates submitted, as well as for the increase of the force employed.

Under the present system of inadequate salaries the examiners, finding that they can earn much more outside of the office than in it, that they can at least earn as much where their lives and health will be less endangered, frequently, I may say usually, resign just when the knowledge acquired in the office makes their retention especially desirable. A fair increase in the salary of examiners, with proper rooms in which to discharge their duties, would, I believe, result in giving the office the benefit of the life services of a body of the most skilled and scientific experts in the world, and vastly enhance the value of our patent system.

If the creation of an independent department for the Patent Office has only the effect to discriminate in the granting of patents and the adequate compensation of the examining corps the benefit conferred upon the country will be immense.

I wish to say that there should be a classification and abridgment of patents. This was proposed in 1873, and from 1873 to 1880 the Commissioners called repeatedly attention to it. In 1880 at last an appropriation of $10,000 was grudgingly given—no, let me say was wrung from Congress—for the classification and abridgment of patents. What do we want this classification and abridgment of patents for? Simply that all the patents may be brought together and arranged under their respective heads, as, for instance, the patents relating to agriculture, and that they may be abridged so that not only the inventors but the person who is to buy or use a patented invention can have the volume before him and see whether he is about to trespass upon or infringe the rights of some other inventor. In short, the inventor wants such an abridgment that he may see whether the contrivance he is thinking about has already been patented. The public wants it to secure itself against imposition. I am quite convinced that such an abridgment, accessible to all, would greatly reduce the number of applications for unpatentable devices and largely prevent the sale of worthless or anticipated patents.

Now, is not that a good work? Is it not a work that needs to be done? Yet when $10,000 had been wrung from a reluctant—I will not say hostile—Congress in 1880 to pursue this work, and when they got the classification and abridgments nearly done as to agricultural patents, the work was stopped because the appropriation was stopped. The Patent Office was paying $300,000 a year over its expenses into the United States Treasury, but they could not have $10,000 a year to continue this necessary and beneficial work that would undoubtedly pay its own expenses, and the first volume, though nearly completed, has never been issued, and is so much dead and useless material in the Patent Office storage-rooms.

So, too, the printing of specifications of old patents should be continued. By that I mean this: The specifications of patents have all been printed back to about No. 47000. The work should be completed back to the first patent. There ought to be a complete printed record of all the patents of the United States from the first granted down to the present time. Such reproduction would be useful not only to inventors but to every citizen. It is a part of the history of our progress. So the index of patentees should be completed. Let me read, at the risk of wearying the Senate, that has been so indulgent to me, a few words from the report to the Commissioner of Patents by the chief of the issue and Gazette division, January 18, 1884:

Some twelve years ago an attempt was made to complete a general index which should not only cover these patents but all patents down to the date of compilation (1873). The subject-matter portion was completed, published, and bound in three volumes, and has since been on sale at $10 per set. The companion volume, Index to Patentees, covering the same period of time, was not finished, and came into my hands when I assumed charge of the division in an incomplete state, awaiting an appropriation. As opportunity offered, with only the regular force of the division, the preparation of the work for the printer was completed, but as no appropriation could be obtained for its publication the matter has lain in manuscript packages in the storage-rooms of the basement until dust, dampness, handling, and the rats have seriously damaged it.

That is a fine showing for an office in this Government which is not only paying its way but paying at the rate of from $200,000 to $500,000 a year into the national Treasury.

While I have been speaking I have received from a prominent manufacturing firm in my own State a dispatch asking me if I can not say something in favor of reducing patent fees. Mr. President, the patent fees ought to be reduced. A tax upon inventors which produces more than enough to pay the current expenses of the office is simply shameful. It is a tax upon knowledge, a tax on invention, a tax which in itself is as iniquitous and abominable as a tax upon authors or scientists would be. Still I am compelled to say that I do not want the fees paid by inventors reduced until the Patent Office becomes a separate Department. I want this glaring inconsistency of the inventors of the country paying the expenses of that branch of the Government and furnishing the Government from $300,000 to $500,000 annually in addition to continue until its voice shall be heard through the land in favor of the establishment of the Patent Office as an independent Department.

Agriculturists have been slow to acknowledge their dependence on patents, but they have been loud in their demands for the enlargement of the Agricultural Department. What was the origin of the Agricultural Department? It is the child of the Patent Office. The Patent Commissioner had charge of the agricultural work from 1836 to 1862, and if I am not mistaken the inventors of the country paid the entire expense of that service in connection with the Patent Office for twenty-five years. Until 1849 there was no separate report. The Commissioner of Patents reported his work in the agricultural line, and from 1849 up to 1862, when there was a separate report, it was called the Patent Office Report, and to-day men write me for the Agricultural Report and call it the Patent Office Report. Many of the farmers in this country still believe that the Agricultural Department is in some way connected with the Patent Office.

The Agricultural Department is the daughter of the Patent Office, but we have taken the daughter away from her mother; we have built her a fine house and furnished elegant surroundings; we have given her costly and fashionable clothing; we pet, I will not say pamper her; we pay her every possible attention, while the old lady, her foster-mother, still scrubs along in the kitchen of the Interior Department and is never noticed except when she deposits the surplus of her daily earnings in the Treasury for the benefit of the rest of the family. It is a shame, and the inventors are beginning to regard it as a shame, and they are going to be heard in their demand that the Patent Office shall receive better treatment than it has received. I make no complaint that the Agricultural Department has been made independent; I only protest against the studied neglect of its parent.

Let me close by noticing an argument that I have heard urged against this bill. I have heard it stated that the moment we get the Patent Office created an independent department we shall be wanting to have its head a Cabinet officer. That demand will never come from me, Mr. President; and if I am here in my place in the Senate and it is ever made I will oppose it. There is no reason why the head of the Patent Office department should be a member of the Cabinet. The Cabinet is large enough already. It requires neither the Commissioner of Agriculture nor the Commissioner of Patents within it. They can not add to its value; they can not add to its strength. The Patent department is not of a character which requires representation in the executive council; it exercises little influence on the administrative policy of the Government, very little more influence than do the courts. There is neither need nor propriety that the head of the department should be one of the President's constitutional advisers, and I venture to say that in the last twenty years no question has ever arisen in Cabinet council regarding the administration of the business of the Patent Office. I venture to say the Secretary of the Interior has not been called upon in Cabinet sessions in twenty years to express any opinion as to the management of that portion of his Department. With the other branches it is different; the railroads, the Indians, and the lands have much to do with the political management of our Government. The administration must have a policy with regard to the Indians, with regard to land grants and land-grant railroads, but as to patents it needs and should have no other policy than that so plainly expressed in the Constitution.

Mr. President, I think I have given sound reasons why the patent system should be permitted to stand alone. If time would have permitted I might have urged many other weighty considerations. I am sure that in what I have said I voice the sentiment of a great multitude of our people who have a right to be heard and who will be heard in favor of this proposition. It is a voice that comes from men who have contributed most to our national prosperity, to our power, to our influence, to our advancing civilization. It is rather a demand than a voice, and we shall do well to heed it.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Patents.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 2334) to release the American Baptist Home Mission Society from the conditions of the sale of the marine-hospital building and grounds at Natchez, Miss.; and

A bill (H. R. 5255) for the relief of the heirs of John S. Fillmore, deceased.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 31, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

CONSULAR BUILDINGS AT SHANGHAI, CHINA.

Mr. HARDEMAN, from the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, reported back the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be instructed to furnish the House of Representatives with copies of all papers and correspondence on file in the Department of State between the said Department of State and Mr. Young, United States minister at Pekin, O. N. Denny, esq., late United States consul-general at Shanghai, and George F. Seward, esq., while consul-general of the United States to China, having reference to the present premises owned or leased by him, together with all circular notices and instructions issued by the said State Department within the last eighteen months regarding the use and occupation of consular premises, including the dwellings of consular officers in China, and the responses thereto by the consular officers in China; also a copy of the letter of resignation of said O. N. Denny, late United States consul-general, resigning his said office, and letter accompanying the same, and of the answer of the Department accepting such resignation, as well as with a detailed statement of all moneys paid by the said Department of State for the rent of the present consular premises at Shanghai, China, for the past nine years.

Mr. HARDEMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture some resolutions adopted by the Georgia State agricultural society.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The resolutions are as follows:

Georgia State Agricultural Society, session at Savannah, February 12, 1884.

The following resolutions were introduced by Hon. Morgan Rawls, and unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That this convention of delegates, representing the agricultural associations of the State of Georgia, with an earnest desire to elevate the pursuit of agriculture on a full and recognized equality, in civil and political character, with any and all honorable callings and professions of high order, do hereby most respectfully and earnestly petition Congress, now in session, to take such action as may be necessary to place the Department of Agriculture on an equal footing with each and all of the Executive Departments of the Government.

Resolved, That the members of Congress from this State be requested to present the foregoing resolution to Congress and use their efforts to accomplish its purpose.

Resolved, That the secretary of this convention forward a copy of these resolutions to each member of Congress from this State.

A true copy.

E. C. GRIER, Secretary.

WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN.

Mr. POLAND. A majority of the Committee on the Judiciary on Friday last made an adverse report upon the bill (H. R. 1980) for the relief of William McGarrahan; there is also a minority report upon that bill. It was understood that the bill would be placed upon the Private Calendar, but it was laid upon the table. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be placed upon the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

PIEDMONT RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. CABELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6256) to authorize the Court of Claims to take jurisdiction of and adjudge the claim of the Piedmont Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ABBIE SHARPE.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Some time ago the bill (H. R. 2018) for the relief of Abbie Sharpe was reported adversely. I am directed by the Committee on Claims to ask that the bill, with the adverse report, be recommitted to that committee for review.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MARINE HOSPITAL, NATCHEZ, MISS.

Mr. MOULTON. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar for consideration at this time the bill (H. R. 2334) to release the American Baptist Home Mission Society from the conditions of the sale of the marine-hospital building and grounds at Natchez, Miss. It was reported unanimously from the Committee on the Judiciary, and relates simply to a local matter. It is for the purpose of sanctioning the sale of property owned by a colored Baptist society in the city of Natchez. It will take but a moment to consider it.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Private Calendar and considered in the House.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas the marine-hospital building and grounds at Natchez, Miss., were sold, under and in pursuance of law, at public auction, on the 15th of February, 1876, to the American Baptist Home Mission Society, for the sum of $5,000, it being the highest bidder at said sale; and

Whereas, pursuant to act of Congress approved August 15, 1876, said sale was authorized and confirmed, and by deed dated January 4, 1877, said building and grounds were conveyed by the Secretary of the Treasury to said society, for and in consideration of the sum of $5,000, upon the express condition and covenant nevertheless in said deed contained that the building on said grounds should be reconstructed and devoted, under responsible auspices, to purposes of instruction for the benefit of the colored people of the United States, in accordance with the said act authorizing and confirming said conveyance; and

Whereas the said society has faithfully fulfilled the conditions and covenants in said deed contained, and now desires to sell said building and grounds to the city of Natchez for the purposes of a city hospital, and to devote the proceeds of such sale to the construction of a school building at Jackson, Miss., to be used for the purposes of education for the benefit of the colored people: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to quitclaim and release the said marine-hospital building and grounds to the said American Baptist Home Mission Society, free and clear of the aforesaid conditions and covenants in said deed contained.

Mr. RANDALL. That bill is all right.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MOULTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ELLIS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the regular order is the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for printing and reference to their appropriate committees. Before the call is proceeded with the Chair will lay before the House sundry personal requests of members, if there is no objection.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JOHN S. WISE, for two days.

To Mr. ATKINSON, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. SENEY, until April 8, on account of important business.

To Mr. COX, of North Carolina, for three days.

PENSIONS, BOUNTY, AND BACK PAY.

Mr. BREWER, of New York, by instructions of the Select Committee on Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, asked and obtained unanimous consent for the reprinting of Miscellaneous Document No. 43, with additions and corrections made by the committee.

PACIFIC NATIONAL BANK, BOSTON.

Mr. BUCKNER, by instructions of the Committee on Banking and Currency, asked and obtained unanimous consent to have printed for the use of the House the statements, records, and evidence in the investigation of the Pacific National Bank of Boston, Mass.

INDEBTEDNESS OF PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. CASSIDY, by instructions of the Committee on Pacific Railroads, asked and obtained unanimous consent that the communication of the Commissioner of Railroads relative to the indebtedness to the Government of the Union and Central Pacific Railroads be printed for the use of the House and of the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been called for.

Mr. CURTIN. I ask the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] to withdraw the call for the regular order for the moment.

Mr. ELLIS. I will do so.

The SPEAKER. The call for the regular order is withdrawn.

JOHN S. FILLMORE.

Mr. CURTIN. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar for consideration at this time the bill (H. R. 5255) for the relief of the heirs of John S. Fillmore, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas on the 14th day of December, A. D., 1864, John S. Fillmore, then of Denver, Colo., since deceased, conveyed to the United States of America lots numbered 28 and 29, in block numbered 46, in Denver City (east division), per survey of E. D. Boyd, in the then Territory of Colorado, for the purpose and upon the condition that the same should be occupied as a post-office site, which condition has never been in any part performed: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That all the interest which the United States of America acquired by, through, or under the said deed to the said lots as above described be, and the same is hereby, relinquished to and vested in the persons who by the laws of Colorado would have been entitled thereto, at the date of the death of said Fillmore, had the said deed never been made, and to their heirs and assigns forever.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the only consideration for that claim is that the post-office was not located on the site designated for the purpose.

Mr. CURTIN. Yes; it was located on another site. The bill is all right.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Private Calendar and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CURTIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARY A. LEWIS.

Mr. BROADHEAD. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 690) for the relief of Mary A. Lewis, widow of Joseph N. Lewis, be taken from the Speaker's table for reference to the Committee on Claims.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read twice, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

ADULTERATED FOOD AND DRUGS.

Mr. BEACH. I am directed by the Committee on Public Health to report back with an amendment the resolution which I send to the desk and to ask its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which there will be opportunity for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is popularly charged and generally believed that divers and various articles of food, drink, and medicine are adulterated by admixture with baser and usually deleterious substances; and

Whereas such adulterated compounds are injurious to public health and calculated to shorten human life: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Public Health be authorized and directed to inquire into the truth of said alleged abuse, and to report to this House the result of their investigation at as early a day as practicable; and if it shall be shown that such practices exist, then to suggest or recommend in their report what further legislation, if any, is necessary to correct the wrong. And that they may the more effectively do their work,

Be it further resolved, That said committee be, and they are hereby, empowered to send for persons and papers and to employ such chemical and medical experts as they may deem necessary to carry out the end, aim, and object in view.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out the words "and to employ such chemical and medical experts."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. DUNHAM. I object.

Mr. BEACH. I will state for the information of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] that this resolution simply authorizes the Committee on Public Health to make investigation in regard to adulterated food and drugs.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Is there a report accompanying the resolution?

The SPEAKER. There is.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I would like to hear the report read.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to the consideration of the resolution, and it is not before the House.

Mr. DUNHAM. I withdraw the objection, reserving the right to renew it after the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Public Health, to which the annexed resolution was referred, has had the same under consideration, and directed that it be amended by striking out the words "and employ such chemical and medical experts," and as thus amended recommend its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this report?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I object to the resolution, but not to its consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I would like to hear some reason for this investigation. I suppose the resolution contemplates sending for persons and papers, and probably the committee will become migratory before they get through. If this expenditure is to be made I would like to know why. That is all.

Mr. BEACH. I will state for the information of the gentleman from Indiana that this resolution does not contemplate the expenditure of any money whatever. For the purpose of avoiding such expenditure, the Committee on Public Health, to which the resolution was referred, has struck out those words which proposed to authorize the employment of chemical and medical experts. From the language of the resolution it appears, as the gentleman from Indiana would have observed if he had listened to the reading, that there is being palmed off on the market a large amount of adulterated food and drugs, and this inquiry is proposed for the purpose of ascertaining to what extent these adulterations prevail, and whether any legislation is necessary to prevent them in the future. That is the simple object of the resolution.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. But the resolution does contemplate sending for persons and papers, and this must involve the expenditure of money. Now, we have always had adulterated drinks, foods, and everything of that kind in this country. Unless there is something peculiar in the present situation there is no occasion whatever for making this matter the subject of Congressional investigation. While I am not very much of a "State-rights" man, I think this is a subject to which the States may properly give attention and as to which local legislation may afford every necessary relief. Therefore, unless there is some peculiar reason, unless there is now existing something out of the ordinary course, I can not see why this investigation should be had.

The truth is, there is a tendency, I fear, on the part of Congress to raise these investigations. I think the rule has been established—at least gentlemen have intimated the rule should be—that no investigation involving persons or commodities should be had unless some specific charge is made. If this investigation is directed toward the oleomargarine question, let it be so stated. I hope at least that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] will indicate what kinds of food or drugs the committee proposes to investigate. Unless there is some particular object to be attained by the investigation, it ought not to be had.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, we have been trying for some time to get before the House the question of the investigation of oleomargarine and adulterated dairy products, but from one accident and another have failed to do so. As I understand the scope of this resolution it permits that investigation.

It was provided by a clause in the agricultural appropriation act passed at the first session of the Forty-seventy Congress that the Agricultural Department should make inquiry into the amount and other statistics of these adulterated dairy products. Inquiries were sent out from the Agricultural Department to different parts of the country wherever the officials could hear of these manufactures, but they utterly failed to elicit any information giving the quantity of these products or the markets where they are used or disposed of. An attempt was made to obtain this information through the Produce Exchange of New York; but the secretary of that association answered, as others have done, that, the manufacture and sale of these products being carried on clandestinely, the association was unable to trace or track them, and therefore could give no statistics, although they knew that immense quantities were scattered through the country, and were consumed by persons who did not know what they were using, because of the secrecy and fraud of this trade.

It has been shown within a few days, Mr. Speaker, by examinations in the State of New York, that the workmen who were engaged in the manufacture of these substances were so affected by the acids used for the purpose of deoderizing the filthy materials which were manufactured into dairy products, as they call them, that their nails fell from their hands and their teeth dropped from their mouths. In that State they have made as fair and full an investigation as can be made in any one State.

Besides that, we see in the West that the State of Missouri has seen fit to protect itself by laws of absolute prohibition of this commodity. And yet here in Washington, and all over the country, we are subject to have these products forced upon us by the cupidity of dishonest men, while we are left without power to protect ourselves in any manner whatsoever.

I do not understand this resolution intended particularly this item, but I believe if it is passed it will give this House an opportunity, give the Medical Committee a chance for investigation, which will have the effect to expose and uncover beyond all doubt the evils which, as I think, actually exist in reference to this particular matter, and will be the means of giving us the power to remedy the evil effects of this abominable traffic which has been forced upon us to the injury of great agricultural interests and the poisoning of whole communities.

Mr. WAIT. Mr. Speaker, I trust this investigation will be under the authority of Congress. It can be made more thorough and effectual than by single States not acting in concert.

I fully indorse all that has fallen from the lips of the gentleman from New York. The imitations of genuine butter which are spread broadcast over the land, made undoubtedly from materials used for the purpose by deodorizing them or otherwise fitting them for sale in the market, are undermining the health of the people who are subject to their use.

But this resolution goes much further. We know we are all the time receiving circulars or being informed through the columns of the public press that the various articles which enter into our daily food are being corrupted and poisoned by adulterations for the purpose of cheapening them, and thereby injuring the public health. And it does seem to me that any resolution ought to receive the sanction of this Congress which looks to an investigation calculated to protect the health of the people of the country.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, if it be true as has been asserted, why may not the committee formulate a bill so far as Congress may have jurisdiction to legislate to prevent these evils? It is assumed they exist. If Congress has power to legislate under the assumption they do exist, I can not see what good can come out of an investigation of the facts. If the committee are merely sent out to ascertain whether these adulterations are made, why may they not assume they are made, and in that view why may they not bring legislation into the House to prevent them? At the end of this investigation it may be ascertained, and I presume it will be, that butter and other commodities are adulterated, and that is all there is of it.

Mr. BEACH. I have to inform the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Speaker, that I am not responsible for the introduction of this resolution, nor is the committee of which I happen to be chairman. It was introduced here by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GREEN] and sent to our committee, and we reported it back favorably with an amendment so the committee might not have the power to employ medical experts, but otherwise should enter upon this investigation. We thought, however, that the powers of the committee would be seriously crippled if they did not have the power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. What can be gained by the investigation unless you have experts?

Mr. BEACH. We will be enabled to obtain information, upon which information we can predicate a bill, and in that way bring the whole matter before the House for action.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. But I do not see how you can get your facts unless you have these experts.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to ask the gentleman a question, if he will permit me.

Mr. BEACH. Certainly.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the resolution whether this object can be accomplished with a limitation of expenditure, say to $1,000? In that connection, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that this subject has been before a committee of which I am a member from time to time. I can say further, we are not in possession of undisputed facts at this time sufficiently to give direction to proper legislation. I had some doubt about the propriety of this resolution at first until I further considered its scope. I regard it as a part of the information necessary for our future action in reference to the verified exports of the country. Those products are now increasing, and there is great interest in this question. There is great interest in my own State, which is rapidly becoming a State for the production of food from the dairy. This touches a question in reference to which we have been getting petitions for two or three years.

If this committee can within a reasonable time and at a reasonable expenditure of money ascertain the real facts with reference to this adulteration, I believe it will be beneficial not only to the country but also to Congress in formulating any legislation that may be necessary upon the subject. But what seems to be an objection in the minds of some gentlemen will be removed if the committee charged with the investigation of this matter, provided it shall be ordered, are willing to accept an amendment fixing the amount of the expenditure at not to exceed $1,000. I would like to hear the opinion of the gentleman from New York upon that point.

Mr. BEACH. In answer to the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa, I desire to say that it was not in the contemplation of the committeee to expend any money whatever to send for persons and papers.

Mr. KASSON. It would be no objection to me if the investigation did involve some expenditure, as it usually does when committees are authorized to send for persons. They should certainly pay the expenses of witnesses who appear before the committee.

Mr. BEACH. There is such widespread feeling throughout the country with reference to this matter, that we have had already voluntary offers of testimony from nearly every section where this manufacture is carried on.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire simply to express my concurrence with the views expressed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE]. If it is deemed necessary that any action whatever shall be taken upon this subject, undoubtedly we are already in possession of the facts. We all have information now as to the adulteration of butter, and with reference to the manufacture of imitation butter, oleomargarine, &c., by the ton, as referred to by the gentleman from New York. It is a manufacture that is already in existence; and while I do not speak of it now as a thing to be absolutely condemned, but only of the fact that it exists, and that the adulteration of butter in many forms and with many substances, whether deleterious or otherwise I do not pretend to say, is as notorious as any other fact connected with our commerce, still there is nothing in the manufacture itself that can give us jurisdiction over a question that does not belong to us. But if this information, which we all possess, is not sufficient for the introduction of a bill, provided Congress has the power to impose legislative restrictions upon the manufacture, let me ask what would be the effect of ascertaining more about the subject by an investigation as proposed here? But, sir, I am not sure that any necessity exists for Congressional action at all upon the subject. Each State within itself, under the power that it possesses to establish police regulations, has the unquestioned right to pass laws of inspection and to regulate the manufacture and sale of adulterated or unwholesome food products.

Mr. KASSON Let me interrupt the gentleman to say that that would not protect us here in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BEACH. Nor in the Territories.

Mr. KASSON. Nor would it afford a proper guarantee for our exports.

Mr. REAGAN. It is true that it would not apply to the District of Columbia or to the Territories; but the States have power within themselves to regulate the business, and if it be deemed necessary we can adopt such measures as will restrict the manufacture and sale within the Territories. But my point is—and I do not care to go into the question now of the constitutional power of Congress to enter upon this question of legislation in the States—my point is that if it be necessary to adopt some measure to meet the evil, what is the need for an investigation for the purpose of devising legislation, at the end of which investigation we would know exactly what we know now?

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I think we have now already presented before the committees of this House some six or seven thousand bills for our action. Before the war we used to have about five hundred bills during the session. Now we have somewhere about 8,000. We are omnivorous. We are taking in everything. We are now discussing a matter of health—a local matter—and after a while we will have a committee sent out to investigate how much sand the grocer puts into his sugar or how much water is put into the milk.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. This resolution covers that now.

Mr. COX, of New York. Of course it covers it, State rights and all. Why can not we keep within the purview of our Federal power? Why this investigation? Is it to investigate oleomargarine? What is it? Is it to help the farmer? If it is, let the States do it. That is within their ordinary functions. It is a local matter belonging to the States. Let us keep our hands out of it. I see my colleague has risen for some purpose.

Mr. BEACH. I want to ask a question.

Mr. COX, of New York. Very well.

Mr. BEACH. Will my friend tell me whether during the last Congress he did not vote in favor of a bill to prohibit the importation of adulterated tea?

Mr. COX, of New York. That was a matter of commerce from abroad.

Mr. BEACH. That is what this is or what it contemplates—it affects our export trade.

But during the consideration of that proposition to stop the importation of adulterated teas I objected because it did not go far enough. We have adulterated coffee and adulterated spices and all other matters of adulterated commodities coming in from abroad, and the object of this is to see if we can not formulate a general law upon the subject that will stop it.

Mr. COX, of New York. The Committee on Commerce has already reported or is to report upon this and kindred subjects in a general inspection bill covering exports and imports. That would be wise. But the idea of putting these little microscopic bills in every Monday morning for the purpose of giving work for investigating committees and going for the "surplus" is what the great body of this Congress and of this country should object to. I therefore move to lay this proposition on the table.

Mr. PARKER. I ask the gentleman to withhold that motion until I can have a moment on this question. I know he is very courteous, and I appeal to him to do so.

Mr. COX, of New York. I yield to my friend from the Saint Lawrence, and will withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. PARKER. In a very few words it is my wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to the fact that there is now being established (of course he does not know it) at San Antonio, Tex., a great manufactory for the manufacture of this kind of butter. One hundred thousand cattle are now being gathered together there to make the first organization of this establishment, which is to send its beef-butter to the North.

I wish to say further, we are familiar with the fact that the city of New York, so well represented and so long by the gentleman from Ohio, or from New York by the way of Ohio, has an immense shipping interest in this commodity. We are well aware that the oil made in the city of New York from tallow shipped from Chicago is sent to Holland and Belgium by the ship-load, and there, 50 per cent. perhaps of fresh butter having been mixed with 50 per cent. of this ingredient, the mixture is shipped to England and other markets and there meets our products on those shores.

To show the necessity of further investigation I desire to quote a few sentences of a letter from John H. Hodgson, secretary of the committee on information and statistics of the New York Produce Exchange. He says:

> The manufacture, transportation, and, to a large extent, the handling of it by dealers and retailers are so secret and misleading that the dairy section throughout the United States, with traders in this and other cities in pure butters, are suffering severely.
> In fact, the decreased export trade in butter may be largely laid at the door of imitation butters.
> It would seem that nothing short of national legislation thereon, with severe penalties for the unlawful and fraudulent issuance and representations, intended or otherwise, of those manufactured imitation butters, would suffice for the protection of producers and dealers in pure butters.

I have also a communication, dated February 20, from a manufacturer in the city of New York, in which he says:

> As we are interested in these articles, we should like to know when and where your committee receives testimony or information. Being manufacturers of the article, we are able to give you some very important information, and one of our firm will be willing to appear when called upon to do so.

As a matter of later information I may state I have been shown within a few days a new commodity that the manufacturer calls creamerine. He does not tell how it is made, but he says it can be made for 14 cents a pound; and they will put one-half or two-thirds of this creamerine in what they will call butter when the article is completed. Thus a new commodity, now threatening the dairy products of the country, can be made for 14 cents per pound, and will be sold for 30 or 40. I ask that this committee, in addition to its other duties, shall be allowed to investigate this matter, not in the interest of a locality, but in the interest of the dairymen, farmers, and consumers of the country.

Mr. COX, of New York. My friend from New York, my colleague

[Mr. PARKER], seems to locate me in Ohio. I have lived for eighteen years in New York and have represented the agricultural, commercial, and other interests of that State. This proposed action is supposed to be based on the general-welfare clause of the Constitution. Mr. Speaker, the general-welfare clause of the Constitution does not recognize this everlasting Federal intermeddling in matters connected with local affairs. Already Illinois, Missouri, New York, and other States have passed laws to give the remedy for the mischief so well pointed out by my friend. It is there the remedy is to be found. I therefore renew my motion to lay this resolution on the table.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] if the laws of Missouri will protect us in the District of Columbia?

Mr. COX, of New York. Gentlemen from Missouri tell me their laws will protect them in Missouri; but as to the District of Columbia——

Mr. ELLIS. I submit that the motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. BEACH. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BEACH. Does the motion of the gentleman from New York cut off debate?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. BEACH. I trust it will be voted down.

The question being taken on the motion to lay the resolution on the table, there were—ayes 69, noes 66.

Mr. BEACH. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered—forty-three members voting therefor.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the resolution be again read.

The resolution was again read, together with the amendment proposed by Mr. KASSON, providing that the expenditure shall not exceed $1,000.

Mr. BEACH. I desire to say I am willing to accept an amendment striking out entirely the power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. COX, of New York. I object to debate.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 114, nays 124, not voting 83; as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The following members were announced as paired on all political questions until further notice:

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana, with Mr. STOCKSLAGER.
Mr. MORGAN with Mr. MORRILL.
Mr. YOUNG with Mr. BAYNE.
Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, with Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois.
Mr. COBB with Mr. GEORGE.
Mr. MCADOO with Mr. THOMAS.
Mr. MULLER with Mr. WADSWORTH.
Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, with Mr. HOLTON.
Mr. DUNCAN with Mr. SMITH.

The following were announced as paired for this day:

Mr. THOMPSON with Mr. LIBBEY.
Mr. BURNES with Mr. CALKINS.
Mr. COX, of North Carolina, with Mr. RYAN.
Mr. GEDDES with Mr. BREWER, of New Jersey.
Mr. DAVIDSON with Mr. MOREY.

The following members were also announced as paired:

Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. WASHBURN, until April 7.
Mr. CAMPBELL, of New York, with Mr. RUSSELL, until April 1.
Mr. DORSHEIMER with Mr. POLAND, until April 1.
Mr. MORSE with Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, until April 7.
Mr. CONVERSE with Mr. KASSON, until Tuesday next.
Mr. WEMPLE with Mr. JOHNSON, until April 3.
Mr. SENEY with Mr. BISBEE, until April 8.
Mr. TALBOTT with Mr. HARMER, until April 1.
Mr. MUTCHLER with Mr. ATKINSON, until April 3.
Mr. KEIFER with Mr. REED, on the trade-dollar bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I had supposed that my pair with my colleague, Mr. ROBINSON, extended until to-morrow, and therefore I did not vote.

Mr. REESE. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. CANDLER, is detained at his room by sickness.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The question recurred upon the adoption of the resolution reported from the Select Committee on the Public Health.

Mr. BEACH. I desire to say that I am willing to accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON], and I now move the previous question on the resolution and pending amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendment offered by Mr. KASSON was then agreed to.

The SPEAKER. There is an amendment pending, reported from the committee, to strike out the words "and to employ such chemical and medical experts."

The question was taken upon agreeing to the amendment; and upon a division there were—ayes 93, noes 12.

So (no further vote being called for) the amendment was agreed to.

The question was then taken upon adopting the resolution as amended; and upon a division there were—ayes 89, noes 70.

Mr. BAGLEY. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BEACH and Mr. COX, of New York, were appointed.

Mr. KASSON. We had better have the yeas and nays.

Mr. PARKER. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. COX, of New York. Would it be in order to move to recommit this bill with instructions?

Mr. BEACH. It is not a bill; it is a resolution.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am making an inquiry of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A motion to recommit would be in order.

Mr. COX, of New York. Then I move to recommit, with instructions to strike out the appropriation.

Mr. KASSON. There is no appropriation.

Mr. COX, of New York. Does it not say "not less than $1,000?"

Mr. KASSON. "Not more than $1,000."

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to strike out that clause.

Mr. KASSON. That has just been put in; it is not in order to strike it out now.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Public Health with instructions to strike out that clause. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] is not so obtuse as he seems to be.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] had better reduce his motion to writing.

Mr. KASSON. I make the point of order that the motion to recommit is not in order pending the division of the House upon the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. There was an attempt to take the vote, but no quorum voted, and therefore it amounted to nothing.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will move to recommit this resolution irrespective of instructions; the committee know enough now without instructions.

Mr. BEACH. I move to lay the motion to recommit on the table.

The question was taken upon the motion to lay on the table; and upon a division there were—ayes 66, noes 83.

So (no further count being called for) the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Public Health.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] whether he will not allow the vote to be taken directly on the passage of the resolution?

Mr. COX, of New York. The motion is not debatable; I can not say a word. [Laughter.]

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman has said too many words already.

Mr. WELLER. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to recommit.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being 52 in the affirmative—more than one-fifth of the last vote.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 117, nays 116, not voting 88; as follows:

YEAS—117.

CHEYENNE INDIAN RAID.

Mr. ANDERSON also submitted the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas; which was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The resolution is as follows:

STATE OF KANSAS, OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

I, James Smith, secretary of state of the State of Kansas, do hereby certify that the following and annexed is a true and correct copy of the original instrument of writing filed in my office March 24, 1884.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal. Done at Topeka, Kans., this 25th day of March, 1884.

[SEAL.]

JAMES SMITH, Secretary of State.

House concurrent resolution No. 4, relating to the payment of sufferers from the raid of Cheyenne Indians across the western part of Kansas in 1878.

Whereas during the year 1878 the Cheyenne Indians made a raid across the western part of Kansas; and

Whereas many persons were killed and a large amount of property was destroyed; and

Whereas a few of the claims have been paid; and

Whereas many of said claims for damages now remain unpaid and unadjusted; and

Whereas some of the sufferers lost everything they possessed and have never been able to recover any part of said property, and are now getting old and are in needy circumstances: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives requested to use all proper measures to secure a speedy settlement of these claims now remaining unpaid.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be instructed to forward a copy of these preambles and resolutions to the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. KING also introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 220) making an appropriation of $400,000 for the relief of the sufferers from the present overflow in the lower Mississippi Valley; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. KING. I ask that the joint resolution be read at length.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the floods now prevailing in the lower Mississippi Valley are carrying desolation to the homes of hundreds of thousands of citizens of a section of our country almost as large as the whole of New England; and

Whereas appeals have come up from these suffering people to their Representatives in Congress for aid; and

Whereas the governor and other officials of the State of Louisiana have applied to the Secretary of War and to their Senators and Representatives in Congress for relief for the sufferers from the flood in that State, setting forth that the distress is as great as it was in the unprecedented flood of 1882, which continued over the country for a period of several months: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the sum of $400,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War for the immediate relief of these sufferers from the flood of the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DOWD and Mr. ELLIS called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the morning hour for the call of committees be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

The SPEAKER. The morning hour having been dispensed with, the regular order is the unfinished business coming over from last Thursday.

Mr. ELLIS. It was my intention to have called up the Indian appropriation bill at this time, and I shall still insist upon doing so unless I can understand from the gentleman in control of the trade-dollar bill that the discussion of it will be finished this evening. I am willing to yield the floor for the remainder of this day, but unless there is an understanding that that bill shall be finished this evening I must insist upon going on with the appropriation bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is right.

Mr. BLAND. I have not the charge of the pending bill; but I will state that I was very anxious to have a session here on Saturday last to consider that bill; and the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. ELLIS) an hour ago told me himself he expected to give way for it.

Mr. ELLIS. Provided it was finished this evening.

Mr. BLAND. So far as I am concerned it may be finished this evening, at least so that we may vote on it in the morning. I am not at liberty, however, to speak for the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOWD], who has charge of the bill.

Mr. DOWD. I do not understand that I control this matter. I think it is a matter entirely for the House. If I can move the previous question, so far as I am concerned I am ready to do that now. But I do not like to have it said that I am seeking to cut off debate in half an hour, or an hour, or two hours by a motion of that kind.

Mr. CANNON. Is the bill pending in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. DOWD. No, sir; it is now in the House.

Mr. ELLIS. When will the gentleman from North Carolina agree to call the previous question?

Mr. DOWD. I am willing to move it now if that meets the approbation of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] has the floor for debate, having obtained it on Thursday.

Mr. DOWD. Then I will move the previous question at 5 o'clock, if that will be satisfactory.

Mr. ELLIS. Upon that understanding I will not press the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. LACEY. I object to any understanding of that sort which will give us only an hour and three-quarters for debate. We were promised at least two hours.

Mr. ELLIS. I make this proposition: That all debate on this bill shall be concluded this evening, and that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOWD] shall move the previous question, after which he shall give way for a motion to adjourn, and the House can vote on the bill to-morrow.

Mr. BLAND. So far as I am concerned, if the Committee on Appropriations propose to take charge of this bill to limit debate upon it, I would say they had better go on at once with their appropriation bill. I have myself no interest in debating this question except to present my own views, but I know there are other gentlemen who desire to have the same opportunity of presenting their views.

Mr. CASSIDY. The discussion has been all on one side so far.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask unanimous consent that it may be the general understanding that debate on the bill shall be concluded this evening and that the gentleman from North Carolina shall move the previous question, after which the House shall adjourn, and the vote be taken to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. CASSIDY and others objected.

Mr. ELLIS. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills, my object being to call up the bill making appropriations for the Indian service.

Mr. BLAND. I think the gentleman had better let us go on with this bill now, for we can get through with it almost in the time it would take to call the yeas and nays on his motion.

Mr. HAMMOND. I would suggest that debate had better go on until 5 o'clock, and then the sense of the House can be tested on ordering the previous question.

Mr. BELFORD. Is it proposed to call the previous question on the trade-dollar bill?

Mr. CASSIDY. That is just what is proposed.

Mr. BELFORD. I hope that will not be done.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

Mr. BLAND. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that.

Mr. ELLIS. I made what I considered a fair proposition with regard to the trade-dollar bill; it was objected to by gentlemen on the other side. I am informed by the Department of the Interior that the supplies for which the Indian appropriation bill is to provide money ought to be purchased and on their way to the far Northwest by the 15th of April.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for, which is the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the general appropriation bill.

Mr. STEELE. I understood the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] had the floor. If so, how can he be taken from it by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] to make that motion?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] would be entitled to the floor as soon as the bill in question came up for consideration. The title of the bill has not yet been read, and the Chair understood that an effort was being made to come to some understanding in regard to the time for debate on that bill.

Mr. BLAND. If the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] chooses to raise the question of consideration against the trade-dollar bill and proposes to take up all the evening in determining it, then so far as I am concerned I am willing to proceed at once to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. ELLIS; and upon a division there were—ayes 53, noes 62.

Mr. ELLIS. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ELLIS and Mr. CASSIDY were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 73, noes 93.

So the House refused to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

TRADE-DOLLAR.

The SPEAKER. The House will now resume the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4976) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar. Upon that bill the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I regret that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures failed to present to the House a bill having the unanimous support of that committee, and that I felt it to be my duty, as one of a bare minority of that committee, to make a minority report upon this bill.

The bill now under consideration provides in substance that trade-dollars shall be exchanged at the various subtreasuries and mints of the United States for standard dollars, and that trade-dollars shall be a legal tender for Government dues, and that when so exchanged or redeemed or received in payment of dues they shall not again be issued, but shall be recoined into standard dollars and accounted a part of the monthly purchase of bullion. I object to the fourth section of the bill, which provides that the retirement of the trade-dollars shall be at the expense of the monthly purchase of bullion and the coinage of standard silver dollars as now provided by law.

The Director of the Mint, in his estimate as to the number of trade-dollars now in the country, places it at about 8,000,000. Other financial persons, in New York and financial journals, claim that there is as much as 10,000,000 of trade-dollars that may come in under this bill. If there be 10,000,000 of trade-dollars to come in under this bill, the practical effect of it, if the fourth section is retained as it now stands, will be to suspend the monthly purchase of bullion and the coinage of standard dollars as now provided by existing law for about the period of four or five months.

We are now coining silver bullion at the rate of two million dollars' worth per month. I desire gentlemen to mark the distinction between the number of standard dollars coined and the value of the bullion coined. The law now provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall purchase monthly two million dollars' worth of silver bullion, not exceeding four millions, and coin it into standard dollars. It is not that he shall coin 2,000,000 standard silver dollars per month, but that he shall purchase two million dollars' worth of silver bullion per month and coin it into standard silver dollars. Two million dollars' worth of silver bullion at its present price amounts to about 2,300,000 standard silver dollars.

Gentlemen claim that this trade-dollar was issued by the Government, stamped by the Government as a dollar, that it was made a legal tender by the Government for a certain amount, and that it was bad faith on the part of the Government when it repealed that legal-tender quality of the trade-dollar, as Congress did in 1876, and thus depreciated a coin of the Government which at one time was a legal tender the same as subsidiary silver coin. They therefore claim that it is the duty of Congress to again restore the legal-tender quality to the trade-dollar, the same as when it was first issued.

Now, if that argument be true, it simply goes to the point that what we ought to do now is simply to declare the trade-dollar a legal tender the same as the standard silver dollar, and permit it again to go into circulation as it did under the law authorizing its coinage. In doing that we will not interfere with the monthly purchase of silver bullion and the coinage of standard silver dollars under existing law.

If there is an argument at all in favor of the restoring of the trade-dollar to circulation, that argument is simply that the trade-dollar should be placed where it was before the law was repealed which gave it currency as money. Hence it is that the eight or ten millions of trade-dollars which were out in circulation a few months ago, and constituted a portion of the currency of the country, and were taken at par everywhere until the banks saw proper to refuse to receive them, and by that decision practically put them out of circulation, all that we ought to do now is by our act to place the trade-dollar in circulation again as when it was first issued, but not at the expense of the present coinage of silver bullion into standard silver dollars at the rate of two millions of dollars' worth of bullion per month.

What is the practical effect of this bill? It is to restore immediately eight millions of trade-dollars, or ten millions, if there is that quantity outstanding, to the circulation of the country. These trade-dollars, under this bill, will be exchangeable into standard dollars, and the time within which the trade-dollars may be redeemed is proposed to be extended for two years; so that the immediate effect of the bill will be at once to revive the circulation of these trade-dollars. There in my opinion we ought to stop; but the difficulty with the present bill is that we do not stop there, but these trade-dollars are to be recoined, and when presented for recoining are to be counted as part of the monthly purchase of bullion. In this way the bill will in effect suspend the coinage of standard silver dollars now going on for five or six months, as compared with coining the trade-dollar in circulation as heretofore. Now, is it proper to go on with the coinage of the standard silver dollar under existing law? If it be, then it is not right to interfere with that coinage by this bill.

Let me state another objection to the bill. We all know, as a matter of fact, that since the coinage of the silver dollar began Mr. Sherman, the Secretary of the Treasury under the administration of President Hayes, and also the present Secretary of the Treasury have at every annual meeting of Congress asked in their reports that Congress discontinue the coinage of the standard silver dollar. They have, in executing the law upon this subject, coined the minimum amount of silver bullion—$2,000,000 per month—when they might under the law have gone to the extent of $4,000,000 a month. In other words, the administration of this law has been in unfriendly hands. And certainly, if the Treasury Department favors suspending the coinage of silver dollars altogether, the trade-dollar will come in as a part of the monthly purchases, will be treated as a portion of this minimum amount. In other words, if we pass this bill in its present form we simply indorse indirectly the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury that we suspend the coinage of the silver dollar; or we express our opinion that the coinage ought to be limited to the very lowest amount required by law, because we know this will be the action of the Treasury Department under this bill. Does this House desire to do that? Is it a fact that the members of this House wish to indorse the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury that the coinage of silver be stopped? Or do we wish to say that no more than $2,000,000 worth of bullion should be coined monthly? The practical effect of the bill will be in the direction of the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, as it will suspend the monthly purchase of bullion and the coinage of the standard silver dollars under the present law for six or eight months.

Mr. DOWD. Does the gentleman mean to say that under this bill the coinage of the silver dollar will be diminished or restricted?

Mr. BLAND. I say that it will be, considering the present law and the mode in which these trade-dollars have heretofore been circulated.

Mr. DOWD. I am inquiring whether the number of silver dollars actually coined monthly will be affected by this bill?

Mr. BLAND. It will be, if the fourth section of the bill is not stricken out.

Mr. CASSIDY. The gentleman means to say that the volume of the currency will be contracted to that extent.

Mr. BLAND. I mean to say that the difference between the bill as I desire to have it and the bill in its present form is that if the fourth section be stricken out we shall four months from now have $8,000,000 more in circulation than if the fourth section be retained.

Mr. DOWD. Suppose the bill be passed just as it is, shall we not have precisely the same number of standard dollars at the end of three or four or six months that we would have independently of the bill?

Mr. BLAND. Well, Mr. Speaker, if trade-dollars are to come in simply as bullion, then put them at their bullion value; let them occupy the same position before the country as other bullion. But, sir, if you are going to redeem these trade-dollars at par and charge them against this bullion account, then let the fourth section of the bill go out, because it is not presenting the question in a fair manner to say that these trade-dollars shall go in at par and then be counted as bullion. If they are bullion to-day, let them remain so; if they are to be recoined into standard silver dollars, let them be counted separately from the present monthly purchase of bullion.

There is another phase of this question to which I desire to allude. It is argued every day that silver is depreciating and is continuing to depreciate. If there are 10,000,000 of trade-dollars now out, and there may happen to be 12,000,000 or 15,000,000, for the quantity outstanding is merely a matter of speculation, considering that about 36,000,000 have been coined, 10,000,000 would suspend the purchase of bullion for five months, 12,000,000 for six months, and the moment you suspend the purchase of bullion the value of bullion will as a matter of course begin to decrease. Hence, when we meet here next winter the argument will be made that silver has still further depreciated, and those opposed to the coinage of the silver dollar will ask for its suspension on this account.

Mr. STORM. Has the gentleman any objection to making bullion cheaper?

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I propose to address myself to that question before concluding my remarks. I am opposed to making bullion cheaper. On the contrary, I am in favor of opening the mints of this country to the unlimited coinage of silver the same as gold.

But what is the theory of metallic money? On what is that theory based? It is that the Legislature shall declare at what gold and silver shall be coined; what shall constitute a dollar of silver and a dollar of gold, and then making them a legal tender. And there you stop. And there the authority of legislation over that question ought to cease and the mints and nature supply the volume and the demand. If the coinage of silver was unlimited the same as gold—that is to say, if the mints of the United States were open to the unlimited coinage of silver like gold—then the silver mines and the gold mines would furnish the volume of money, and nature would supply the demand and not the mere whim and caprice of Congress.

But, sir, if you say you will coin only two millions per month, if you limit it to four millions, or if you say you will cease to coin silver altogether, or limit the amount of gold or silver, you assume to dictate what the volume of money shall be, and every argument in favor of bimetallic or monometallic money is gone. There is nothing left of it. What is it? Shall Congress determine the amount of paper money to be used? Do you desire that? Why not? If you open the mints to the unlimited coinage of both metals, if to-day you say you shall have unlimited coinage of both silver and gold, and to-morrow you say you shall only coin two or three millions of silver or gold per month, and thereby regulate the volume of metallic money, your argument in favor of metallic money is gone and the theory of the Greenbacker is established when he says Congress should issue money in such volume or amount as may be demanded.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what are the coinage regulations in reference to gold coin?

Mr. BRUMM. I think the gentleman made a mistake. He said that nature would supply the demand. Does he not mean would furnish the supply?

Mr. BLAND. I say when you give unlimited coinage of both gold and silver as money, that the volume is supplied by nature—that is, automatically—unless you undertake to limit it by restricting the coinage.

Mr. BRUMM. You said demand; and I thought you did not mean that, but that you meant supply.

Mr. BLAND. Of course. I was reading from the speech of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SMITH], and I am sorry he is not present. He said in his remarks, and I have not time to read them at length, that silver had the preference of gold or copper or any other metal in the mints; that we compelled the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver and did not compel him to purchase gold or copper. What are the regulations in reference to the coinage of gold? The law requires the Secretary of the Treasury to keep a fund at the mints for that express purpose. The moment a gold miner presents his bullion there he can receive money for it, and he need not wait until it is coined. But if he waits until the mints can coin it he has the right to say that it shall be coined into double-eagles, eagles, or half-eagles, or any other denomination of coin. He can thus dictate the coinage of gold. Generally he prefers to take money and not wait for the coinage. The gold miner extracts dollars, not merchandise. The silver miner can not go to the mint with his bullion at all. His product is put upon the market and the bullion which is offered at lowest rates by the bullion-holder is purchased. Instead of the Government making the bullion value of silver equal to the coinage value, the law compels the Government to go into the market and bear silver bullion and to purchase it at the cheapest rates. This law of the Government depreciates the silver, and the act of the Government furnishes the argument of the gold monometallists against silver. The power of the Government ought to favor silver value, and not depreciate it.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. BLAND. Not now. How is it possible that silver bullion can reach par with gold bullion unless it has the same privileges at the mints and the same uses as money?

I have heard it said, and it is stated in the public press and on this floor, that the moment you open your mints to the unlimited use of silver, you pay a premium of 15 per cent. to the silver-bullion holders. What are you paying to the holder of gold bullion who has a monopoly of money metal? Even him by law you are paying 15 per cent. premium on his gold at the expense of the holder of silver bullion.

Will any one pretend to say that where you give unlimited use to gold, unlimited access to the mints, so the gold miner can go and deposit his bullion and any moment have dollars and cents for it, and the silver miner has not the same privilege, that silver bullion can stand at par with gold?

I may liken it to a county warrant. The county is perfectly good, perfectly solvent, responsible in every respect, and the warrant will be paid in six months or a year at the furthest. But it is discounted for the very reason that you can not at once redeem it in money.

Now, the silver and the gold miner ought to be placed exactly equal in this regard, not for the purpose of accommodating the miner himself, but to furnish the people of this country a circulating medium that has been considered, at least for the last four or five thousand years, as the best monetary metal in the world—and that is silver. I do not own, Mr. Speaker, a single dollar's worth of stock in any mine in this country or elsewhere; I am not the owner of any stock in any national bank, nor do I own any Government bonds, but so far as any individual or personal interest in this matter is concerned I stand free, and am not interested in the question of the coinage of silver or the issuing of bank notes, and I view these matters only in the light of public welfare.

Mr. MORSE. If you are not interested in it, then let me ask why do you insist upon the coining of silver when nobody wants it?

Mr. BLAND. Nobody wants it?

Mr. BELFORD. Everybody wants it in the West.

Mr. BLAND. I would simply tell the gentleman from Massachusetts that he may test that matter very accurately and instantly as to whether anybody wants the silver or not if he will go, or any other gentleman, to the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms and draw his check for the $400 due him for this month, get it in silver, and put it on my desk; he will see how complacently I take it. [Laughter.]

Mr. WELLER. Here, too. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. BLAND. Now, we are told, Mr. Speaker, that silver will not circulate among the people, and that you are coining this metal and simply piling it up in the Treasury vaults, and that it is not being utilized and will not be utilized as money.

I hold in my hand a statement from the Treasury Department showing that up to March 14, 1884, there have been issued in silver certificates $155,430,000, and up to the 1st of March the coinage has been $166,000,000. So that the silver certificates which have gone out and the silver dollars together are at to-day within about twelve millions of the amount coined.

Mr. PUSEY. Now, right there, does not the gentleman know that there are from sixteen to twenty millions of dollars of certificates lying in the Treasury to-day which have never been put in circulation?

Mr. BLAND. I will come to that in the course of my argument.

It is claimed also that the coinage of silver is driving the gold out of this country. Here is the statement of Treasurer Wyman, showing that there has been deposited $79,000,000 of gold in exchange for silver dollars and silver certificates.

The following is the statement I have obtained from Mr. Wyman, the Treasurer, dated 14th March:

Statement of silver certificates issued, redeemed, outstanding, and in the Treasury March 14, 1884.

| Standard silver dollars in the Treasury offices and mints March 14, 1884 | 128,045,028 |

You have to-day in the Treasury $140,000,000 in gold bullion and gold coin. That is there as surplus revenue or revenue for resumption purposes and the daily demand. Now, more than one-half of that has gone into the Treasury in exchange for this hated and maligned silver; and yet it is claimed that nobody wants it. That claim is set up in face of the fact that more than half of the gold in the Treasury to-day not represented by gold certificates is there in exchange for silver certificates. When the Secretary of the Treasury issued his circular permitting this to be done the silver coin ran so low by the demand occasioned by these deposits of gold for silver certificates that the operation had to be suspended for the reason that there was no more silver coin on which to base the certificates.

Now, the gentleman says that there are about twenty millions of these silver certificates in the Treasury to-day.

I read from this statement, made on the 26th March last, as follows:

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Silver dollars in the Treasury | | $128,696,472 |
| Certificates in circulation | $95,715,381 | |
| Certificates in the Treasury | 20,701,440 | |

Well, now, these twenty million of silver certificates are in the Treasury precisely like greenbacks are in the Treasury. They are in the Treasury precisely like gold is in the Treasury, or like national-bank notes. There were twenty millions in the Treasury last Wednesday, but I dare say that there is not so much to-day, and if any gentleman has drawn a portion of his salary to-day I have no doubt that he has been paid some portion of that twenty millions which the gentleman says are in the Treasury. They are in there as the circulating revenue of the Treasury, to be paid out like greenbacks or national-bank notes, and if they are not paid out it is because the Secretary of the Treasury, in order to contract the volume of the currency or make an argument against silver coinage, refuses to pay it out. How does this silver get into circulation? The man who has gold bullion can have it coined at the mints of the country, and the money is returned to him and he pays it out in the various avenues of trade. But the Government will not permit silver to go out in that way into circulation. The law prohibits it. The Government goes into the market and buys up the bullion and coins it into money and then refuses to pay it out, and silver is blamed by its opponents because it does not get out. How can it get out unless the Government chooses to issue it? Are there any expenditures of this Government to which it can be applied? Are there not expenditures to which it can be at all times applied? How will you make provision for the sums to be appropriated under your legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bills? Are there not expenditures under your fortification bills, your Army bill, your Navy bill, your pensions, the four hundred millions that you must provide for the payment of pensions, the public debt, and other expenditures.

And if silver is in the Treasury, why is it not paid out on these appropriations and on the millions of your public debt that is due? It is there, if there at all, in excess simply because the Secretary of the Treasury is hostile to this money; and in obedience to Wall street and the speculators there he hoards it for this purpose, or for the sake of the argument that silver will not circulate.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri if he is in favor of the free coinage of the present silver dollar of 412½ grains, 900 fine, and in favor of the Government buying all the silver bullion that may be brought to the Mint, and giving for it dollar for dollar?

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I want to know why it is that the mints of the country can be opened to the unlimited coinage of gold and not of silver. Will any gentleman answer me that question?

Mr. DINGLEY. But gold is coined at its bullion value, and silver at 17 per cent. above its value.

Mr. BLAND. The very fact that you give it the same use restores it to the value of gold. Now what is the condition to-day? The gentleman says that there is a difference of 17 cents between the gold dollar and the silver dollar; 13 cents is the difference in bullion value. But the purchasing value is the same because the purchasing value is derived from the stamp of the Government upon the coin that it is a dollar. And when the guarantee of the Government is written upon the silver dollar it restores it to equal value with the gold dollar. But you will not permit silver to come in in unlimited quantity and have this guarantee of the Government.

The question is not as to how it shall affect the gold miner or the silver miner, because you have about three billions of silver money in the world—and the question is how it affects that vast stock of money metal on hand. When you say that vast stock that belongs to the debtor class shall be limited in its use by not giving it unlimited coinage you to that extent rob the debtor in favor of the creditor. Therefore the question as to the quantity of silver is not a question between the miners of gold and the miners of silver, but it is a question as to what you propose to do with the vast stock of monetary metals on which debts were contracted, both public and private, in this country and all other countries; because your public debt and your private debt in this Government, and I might say all governments, have been contracted upon the basis of the unlimited use of both gold and silver, or at least upon the metals gold and silver, consisting of three billions of gold and about three billions of silver.

Now, if you are to strike down one-half of the monetary metals by refusing it admission at the Mint, as a matter of course you see the advantage given the creditor class over the debtor class.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for another question?

Mr. BLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does the gentleman from Missouri say that the mere stamp of the Government upon a piece of silver, 412½ grains, 900 fine, will immediately bridge over the 17 per cent. difference between the bullion value and the nominal value? If so, why not as well make the silver dollar 200 grains as 412½ grains? Or why not use iron and stamp that?

A MEMBER. Or paper?

Mr. BLAND. You will come to paper soon enough probably. We have heard that argument before.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow me?

Mr. BLAND. In a moment.

Mr. Speaker, I impale that argument upon the law of the contract. I say there is not a bond of this Government in existence to-day under the law of its issue that is not payable in a dollar of 412½ grains of standard silver; not in iron, not in copper, not in gold alone, but in a dollar of 25.8 grains of gold or 412½ grains of standard silver. Every contract of this Government is based upon that. As regards every bond that is issued except the currencies, your 4 and 4½ and 5 per cent. and 3 per cent. bonds, the tax-payer has the right to pay in a dollar of 412½ grains of standard silver, and it is robbing him not to permit him to do it. The world uses silver as money and guarantees its value; not so with iron or copper.

Mr. BELFORD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BLAND. I can not yield now, as my time is limited.

We were told if silver was restored to its monetary value the public faith would be violated and that it would be impossible to issue bonds at 5 per cent. interest; and that is the class of securities that were being issued at that time. But instead of that, sir, we find that we negotiated bonds at 4½ per cent. and then at 4 per cent., and as we continued coining in silver we have issued them at 3 per cent., and those 3 per cent. bonds are above par; and I believe our friends who desire the continuance of the national banks are willing to-day they should take a 2½ per cent. bond, notwithstanding those bonds are payable, every dollar of them, in this silver dollar.

What has been the effect, sir, of the coinage of this silver? We remember when the mints began to coin silver under the law of 1878 that this country was in poverty and distress; but from the time that we began the coinage of silver confidence took the place of distrust, prosperity that of adversity, and since that time we have, probably since the beginning of our Government, never been more prosperous. We have coined only 166,000,000 of the standard silver dollars; and yet we are asked to suspend the coinage of silver because it is claimed that to continue it will drive gold out of the country. France, with a population of only about 37,000,000, and with a territory not so large as the State of Texas, has to-day in full legal-tender circulation about $550,000,000 of silver, and alongside of that she has in circulation over $800,000,000 in gold.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Is France coining any silver at present?

Mr. BLAND. She is not. But we are asked to stop the coinage of silver at the limit of $160,000,000, when France has about $550,000,000 in circulation of silver; and instead of driving out her gold she has nearly as much gold in circulation as both Great Britain and Germany, gold-standard countries. We have a country with probably 55,000,000 of population at this time, with over 3,000,000 of square miles of territory. We are a nation of people whose industrial genius is hardly equaled, certainly not surpassed, by any other nation of the civilized world. Yet we are asked to act the part of cowards and stop the coinage of silver at the pitiful limit of $160,000,000. It will take nearly fifteen years longer, at the present rate of coinage of the silver dollar, to have the same amount of silver coined and in circulation that France has to-day among her 37,000,000 of people.

Where will this country be at the end of fifteen years from this time? We will have seventy, probably seventy-five, millions of people, with the present increase of population by immigration and natural increase. We have a territory—I need not compare it with the territory of any other country. I say that when you reach the amount of coinage of silver which is now in circulation in France, about fifteen years will have elapsed at the present rate of coinage, and by that time we will have almost if not quite doubled the population of France at this time; and as to material wealth and territory there is no comparison between this country and that of France.

Mr. LACEY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BLAND. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. The question I desire to ask is this: In comparing the amount of our silver coinage with that of France, should not the gentleman take into consideration the subsidiary coinage in this country? The gentleman has included the subsidiary coinage in France, as I understand.

Mr. BLAND. I have not included it in the amount I have given for the silver coinage of France. The unlimited legal-tender silver money, not the subsidiary, in France amounts to about $550,000,000.

Mr. LACEY. But you have not included in your estimate the amount in this country of the subsidiary coinage here.

Mr. BLAND. I did not include the subsidiary coinage in France, either. But, even if I were to put both in, the disparity would be about the same.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Permit me to ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BLAND. Certainly.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If we open our mints, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] proposes, to the free coinage of silver at the rate of 412 grains of silver for one dollar of gold, would not the whole $600,000,000 of silver coinage in France at once come to this country as quick as steamships could bring it, and take away at least 50 per cent. of our gold and transfer it to France?

Mr. BLAND. I say no, and I will give a reason for it. In the first place, we are not fools enough to exchange products or anything else without value, or at a loss, if that is the suggestion; and in the second place, the standard of their coinage is below ours, and the gentleman knows it very well.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Not below.

Mr. BLAND. Yes. We coin silver and gold at the ratio of 16 to 1—that is to say, we require 16 ounces of silver to be worth 1 ounce of gold, while in France 15½ ounces of silver is worth as much as 1 ounce of gold. Neither France nor Germany nor any other country will be willing to lose a half an ounce of silver for every ounce of gold in order to dump their silver down in this country. There is no danger of that. All the silver of Europe circulates at par with gold at 15½ to 1. But there is this danger, that France and the nations of the Latin Union may in the future cease to coin silver altogether if we suspend the coinage of silver.

Mr. DINGLEY. Has not the Latin Union already ceased to coin silver?

Mr. BLAND. Yes; but do not interrupt me just now. After the decision of the Supreme Court on the legal-tender question, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] and others, apprehending some difficulty to result from that, because the Supreme Court had decided that Congress had absolute power to issue paper money and make it a legal tender—the gentleman from New York and other gentlemen in this House, as well as gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol, in order to meet that question introduced constitutional amendments providing that Congress shall have no power to make anything but gold and silver a legal tender. Now I want to know if that is intended to be a deception upon the people of the States? I want to know if you intend to hold out to them the promise of a silver and gold currency, and then the moment you get the power to drop the silver currency entirely? Is it intended the moment that the Legislatures of the several States shall adopt the amendments proposing to make silver and gold the only legal tender, Congress will go to work and demonetize silver or gold? Is that what we are to hold out to the American people? If so, it will be a long time before your constitutional amendment will be adopted. It is necessary to the preservation of this Government and to the maintenance of good faith between debtors and creditors that the unlimited use of both gold and silver as money should be maintained.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the extent of the Government guarantee in the case of the coinage of silver? Suppose we have coined and in circulation to-day $1,000,000,000 of silver, and suppose that the value of the bullion in this coinage is 15 per cent. less than the gold—it is 13 only now, which would be contained in the same amount of coinage—how much gold would it take to supply the deficiency? Gentlemen can make their own conclusion. I believe it would be $150,000,000. If you should undertake to redeem in gold bullion the silver coinage it would cost you only $150,000,000, because the silver bullion in the coinage is worth the rest. This $150,000,000 would be hardly a mill per cent. upon the taxable property of this nation. The world guarantees 85 per cent. of this silver coinage; and the Government is asked to guarantee only 15 per cent. How is it with the legal-tender and the national-bank notes, upon which the Government guarantee is 100 per cent.? How must you redeem your legal-tender note? According to your theory, it must be redeemed in gold, every cent of it. The world supports none of it. How as to your national-bank note? In what is that to be redeemed? It is based upon a debt, and is redeemable in a debt—a debt behind it and a debt before it! It is based neither upon gold nor upon silver. That is to say, there is not a gold dollar nor silver dollar on which it is specially issued; it is credit-money, no more. The opponents of silver, who claim that the vacuum caused by demonetizing silver can be supplied by national-bank notes, must ask for that purpose the continuation of the public debt of this country, not less than six hundred or seven hundred millions of dollars, probably a billion of dollars. The debt must be a little larger than the amount of circulation, in order to give room for contraction and expansion of that circulation. What, then, would be the interest of this national debt? Place the amount at $500,000,000 and with the rate of interest at 3 per cent. the Government must pay $15,000,000 annually in interest. So that your bank paper, if you have bonds to the amount of five hundred million on which to base it, will cost you in interest not less than fifteen million annually. Even the interest which you would pay for the purpose of keeping the bank paper in circulation would in a few short years constitute the difference between gold and silver.

For instance, suppose we have one billion of silver dollars, on which amount we issue one billion of silver certificates; the difference between silver and gold is 13 cents on the dollar, and all the Government has to guarantee is this 13 cents. The world guarantees the other 87 cents in the use of money. Thirteen per cent. of this supposed issue of one billion of silver certificates is one hundred and thirty million, so that one hundred and thirty millions of gold added would bring the silver or silver certificates to par with gold. Compare this with the national-bank system in furnishing our circulating medium. In the instance of silver we have a billion silver certificates. For the national-bank circulation it would require at least six hundred millions of bonds for a circulation of bank notes to the amount of five hundred million; these bonds at 3 per cent. interest would make an annual charge against the Government for interest of $18,000,000 in order to float this five hundred million of bank notes; this charge in ten years will have amounted to $180,000,000, which is fifty million in excess of the gold that would be necessary to keep the one billion silver certificates at par. If we redeem the bonds in twenty years the bonds and interest would nearly equal the one billion silver certificates. Inasmuch as the world guarantees silver up to 87 cents, paper issued on it, dollar for dollar, could never depreciate below the 87 cents so long as the metal is held for its redemption. But bank paper or Treasury notes, being wholly credit-money, must stand or fall with the credit of the nation issuing it. In case of civil commotion or foreign war or disturbances our credit might be greatly impaired and bank notes or Treasury notes go down to 30 or 40 cents on the dollar, as in our last war, but the silver certificate could not be carried lower than the 87 cents on the dollar.

Mr. Speaker, what is the danger of a national debt? I send to the desk to be read two extracts from London journals on this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

The London Economist of March 10, 1883, said:

"The grandeur of the American Republic, considered in its external policy, has moreover been greatly increased by its debt-paying policy, for it has been felt that a people which could now raise four or five hundred millions sterling at 3 per cent. was on that account alone a great people; one which, on cause shown, could create fleets and armies almost out of the ground."

The London Spectator of April 14, 1883, said:

"The grand reason for paying debt is that we want to strengthen the credit of the state, as the cheapest and best of all insurances. If any one doubts that, let him look at the position of the United States. That grand Republic has no fleet, and on the water could hardly fight Spain. But she has reduced her debt by strenuous paying, and every one knows that if she wanted a fleet to blow Spain out of the water or to contest the seas with us she could buy and build one in twelve months. Her payment of her debt is an insurance not only against defeat but against attack."

Mr. BLAND. Thus, Mr. Speaker, we see how important in the estimation of foreign governments is the payment of our national debt. The London Economist and the London Spectator both say that with a nation which can so rapidly pay off its debt the very fact of being out of debt is a sufficient protection without fleets and standing armies. Let us, then, devote our attention to the payment of the debt and the wiping out of the national banks, which must go with the extinction of the debt, because the national-bank system is based upon debt, an interest-bearing debt.

Mr. Speaker, this question of the public debt is a great question which we must meet in the discussion of all monetary affairs. We remember very well that the idea on which the National Greenback party was based and grew up was that we had an immense public debt, bearing interest, and that Congress under the Constitution had the power to issue paper money and to substitute a non-interest-bearing debt for one bearing interest. Under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States this Government would have the power to issue legal-tender paper money and to wipe out your national debt. This national debt has been the objective point with all the labor organizations and greenback parties. They have felt that a national debt of $2,000,000,000 or a billion and a half of dollars was an oppression; and whenever distress and poverty come again upon the country, if you then have a vast national debt, the rallying-cry will be to pay it with paper legal tenders. So long as that debt exists it will furnish a foundation for your labor parties and your greenback parties. But the very moment you take away the national debt you remove all excuse for an overissue of paper money. There is then no further danger in that direction.

The question of debtor and creditor will then relate solely to private debts and thus localize and minimize that influence. One citizen debtor and another creditor, all neighbors, will not consider their interest as divergent, but may all antagonize the public debt. Our national debt is held and concentrated in moneyed centers by a few individuals; hence it is not difficult to excite popular prejudice against it. For this reason, and particularly in view of the recent decision of the Supreme Court on the legal-tender question, the national-bank system, based on the public debt, is an unsafe monetary system.

I quote from the Report of the Silver Commission made in 1877, showing the different nations, with their estimated populations, classified according to their metallic standards, with the United States added to the list:

| SILVER-STANDARD COUNTRIES. | Population. |
|---|---|
| Russia | 76,000,000 |
| Austria | 36,000,000 |
| Egypt | 4,500,000 |

| Sweden | 4,300,000 |
| Denmark | 1,800,000 |
| Portugal | 4,000,000 |
| Total | 92,800,000 |

We have, then, 768,944,456 of population using silver as their standard, 187,300,000 using the double standard, or 956,244,456 who use silver as a standard of money. And now I give you the following extract taken from the report of the Director of the Mint for 1883, namely:

PAPER AND SPECIE CIRCULATION OF THE PRINCIPAL COUNTRIES OF THE WORLD.

The tables which have heretofore been published in my reports giving the paper and metallic circulation of the principal countries of the world, compiled as far as possible from official dispatches and reliable data, have been corrected and enlarged to as late a date as possible, and the number of countries embraced has been increased to thirty-eight.

The total paper circulation of these countries, embracing the issue of both government and bank notes, amounts to $3,832,920,903, and the gold and silver circulation, the latter divided as far as possible into full legal tender and limited tender, amount to $3,333,433,000 gold coin, $2,712,226,000 silver coin—a total, including the coin in banks and treasuries, of $6,045,659,000.

I append to my remarks a table compiled from the report of the Director of the Mint for the year 1883, showing the monetary circulation of the principal countries of the world.

The Director of the Mint estimates the amount of silver used in the circulation of the principal countries of the world, both full legal and limited tender, $2,712,226,000; but let us say it is more and place it at three billion, which would be only $3.15 per capita for the population using silver or silver and gold standard. We must, however, deduct from this $100,000,000 silver used in Great Britain, $213,000,000 in Germany, $5,405,000 in Norway and Sweden, $10,000,000 in Portugal, and in the Danish Kingdom $750,400, making $329,155,400 of this now in use and required in gold-standard countries. The population of these countries, according to the report of the Silver Commission of 1877, is 92,800,000, which would make the silver used and required in these gold-standard countries $3.55 per capita of the population, while in the silver and double standard countries it is only about $2.80.

We have about seven hundred millions of paper money in Treasury notes and national-bank notes. To substitute silver for this on which to issue certificates would require a drain from these other countries of $700,000,000 of silver. This would leave them about two billion to be distributed among their population of about one billion, or $2 per capita of their population. This would so reduce prices or increase the value of silver there as to raise it above par with gold at 16 to 1. The extract from the report of the Director of the Mint above quoted shows about four billions of paper money in circulation in the principal countries of the world, or nearly two-thirds of all the money in use. This fact of itself is proof beyond controversy that the metals, both gold and silver, fail to supply the monetary demands, and shows the reckless spirit that would demonetize silver, constituting as it does nearly one-half of the metallic-money supply of the world.

If silver were thus demonetized prices could not be maintained at their present standard without issuing credit-money to such an extent as to cause financial distrust, bankruptcy, and ruin, and practically ending in the demonetization of both metals. Silver and gold for generations past have been linked together as precious metals and performing the functions of money with all civilized peoples. These two metals must stand or fall together.

Mr. Speaker, many who favor the bimetallic standard claim that we should change the ratio so as to coin silver at its bullion value. This ignores the fact that silver is depreciated by the Government. Silver was demonetized. That act depreciated silver. It is not coined now except on Government account and in limited amounts. This coinage is utterly impotent to restore silver. What is demanded is that the Government, instead of depreciating silver by its laws, shall throw the weight of its wealth and power in the scale in favor of silver by giving it unlimited use as money. In doing this the Government will simply have righted a wrong. After this has been done, if silver is still below gold to such a degree as to disturb the equity of contracts, there might be a reason for changing the ratio. But it is not justice to the creditor class that his Government should by its laws first depreciate silver and then take advantage of its own wrong by coining it at the ratio of this depreciation. Since 1878 we have been coining full legal-tender silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. All existing debts and contracts are based upon that relation, and especially those incurred since we commenced coining silver.

The states of the Latin Union will meet again in a short time to determine whether they will open their mints to the further coinage of silver; hence we ought not either to stop its coinage or change the ratio. In either case we might discourage its friends in the states of this monetary union.

But, Mr. Speaker, as my time is limited, I come back now to the question of the trade-dollar. I say there can be no danger in making these trade-dollars a legal tender and declaring that they shall not interfere with the monthly coinage of silver. The trade-dollars will simply take the place of your contracting national-bank currency. The national-bank currency must continue to contract, and the trade-dollar ought to be put in circulation to meet the deficiency caused by that contraction.

If I have any time remaining I will yield it to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. MILLER, of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the first question presented by the bill under discussion is, should the Government recall and recoin the trade-dollar. That this ought to be done seems almost too plain for argument. The act of February 12, 1873 (Revised Statutes, section 3513), provides that the silver coins of the United States shall be a trade-dollar, half-dollar, &c. The same act fixes the weight and standard alloy of the trade-dollar and makes it of the same fineness of the other silver coins, so that as to its standard of purity it is in no sense a debased coin. The same act (Revised Statutes, section 3586) makes the silver coins of the United States (of which this trade-dollar was one) a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

Thus the trade-dollar was put forth upon the country by force of law as one of the standard coins of the Government, a legal tender in payment of debts, and having all the attributes that legislation gave to any silver coin.

There was nothing in the act of February 12, 1873, to show that this coin was not intended to be one of the coins provided by the Government for general circulation among the people. The fact that it may have been intended for export does not appear in the law of its creation nor elsewhere in the statutes. There was nothing to put the people upon notice that it was not to be received and paid out in business as any other coin until 1876, when its legal-tender quality was taken away by an act of Congress. It then became a disowned bantling bearing the shield and device of the coins of the United States, yet not receivable at its Treasury nor by any of its officers in payment of dues to the Government, not being permitted to have even the poor privilege of being taken in at the Mint and recoined into its more popular successor the Bland dollar. It thus became a burden and a source of loss to citizens who held it and a prolific source of cheating in a small way by being passed upon the unwary or illiterate as a veritable dollar in fact and legal effect of the Government, whose impress it bore and whose dollar-mark was stamped upon its face.

It would seem, therefore, to be the plain duty of the Government to recall and recoin this mischievous production of its mints, and this seems to be generally conceded. But the debatable questions seem to arise out of the manner in which this is to be done. Shall it be bought back by the Government at its face value or at its bullion value, or shall it again be made a legal tender? It is argued by gentlemen who favor a repurchase at its bullion value that the Government would sustain a loss by redeeming it in standard silver dollars.

In answer to this I have to say that the trade-dollar contains 7½ grains more silver than the standard dollar, and this, as stated by the Director of the Mint, will pay all the expenses of its recoinage and still leave a profit to the Government.

The anticipated loss, therefore, is only the probable profits which the Government might make by purchasing silver bullion in the markets and coining it into standard dollars instead of taking the trade-dollar at its nominal value. I for one am not willing for this Government to go into this kind of speculation in its own coins. I believe it ought to be governed by the same moral and legal code that would in like circumstances govern individuals. If an individual makes a negotiable note, puts it upon the market, and it goes into the hands of an innocent holder, he can not plead a failure of consideration to relieve himself from its payment. If the Government issues a paper dollar or a coin dollar and sends it out into circulation, gives it a current value as a dollar, it ought not to refuse to receive it back at such value, even although it might be able to make a profit by doing otherwise.

It is proposed by an amendment to the bill to make the recoinage of the trade-dollar an addition to the coinage of silver authorized by the act of February 28, 1878. The effect of this would be to increase our annual coinage of silver from five to eight millions of dollars during the present year, if all these trade-dollars should be reached this year, and to put that much more silver in circulation.

I think this is desirable as a remedy for the probable contraction of our currency circulation. During the last fiscal year our surplus revenues were $132,879,444.41, of which sum $105,322,450 were used in paying off our interest-bearing debt; yet with this large retirement of bonds our circulation of currency was only diminished $10,713,960; during the same time there was an increase in gold circulation of $34,613,992 and of silver circulation $33,957,508, showing a net yearly gain in circulation of $57,857,540.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. LACEY. I yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER, of Texas, continuing, said: The Secretary of the Treasury estimates the surplus revenue at eighty-five millions of dollars for the current fiscal year, of which it will be necessary to apply forty-five millions to the sinking fund. This estimate is probably too low, but if we put the surplus revenue at one hundred millions we will have fifty-five millions left for the payment of the 3 per cent. bonds, about two-thirds of which are held by the national banks as a basis of circulation, upon which there is probably $90 of circulation for each $100 of bonds. Now, if the whole surplus revenue were invested in these 3 percents (except the sinking fund), it would cause a contraction of circulation in currency of about thirty-six millions of dollars. Under the act of 28th February, 1878, our silver coinage can not be less than twenty-seven millions of dollars per year; add to this, say, eight million trade-dollars, and the deficiency in circulation will be met so nearly as to not cause any disturbance in values.

There is also the further proposition by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to make the coinage of silver free as gold now is, or, in other words, to permit the owners of silver to have it coined at the mints at their pleasure, they paying the expense of coinage.

I believe this would afford a remedy for any threatened contraction of currency circulation, and that it would be a remedy for the accumulation of silver in the vaults of our Treasury. Now the Government goes upon the market, purchases silver bullion, and coins it into money. It is the property of the Government, and will stay there until the Government chooses to pay it out. If it belonged to individuals they would not pay the expense of coining it until they desired to use it, so that upon being coined it would go out into circulation in some shape. On November 1, 1883, the national-bank notes outstanding amounted to $352,013,787. Because of the increase of premium on United States bonds, the basis of this circulation, it has ceased to be profitable to the banks, and they threaten to surrender their circulation, and thus create a very severe contraction of the currency, unless some relief be afforded them.

There can be no permanent relief to these banks except by an extension of the time of payment of the bonds of the Government for a long period, and this I regard as not for a moment to be considered. In my judgment the people of the United States desire the payment of their interest-bearing debt as rapidly as the surplus revenues will permit, and it is for the best interests of the people that this should be done. It will be wise, therefore, for us to begin to prepare for some other circulation than national-bank notes. To what better source can we look than to a currency based upon gold and silver in circulation or in our Treasury vaults?

On June 30, 1882, our coin and bullion were estimated at $700,455,545; on June 30, 1883, $765,470,993. Our coinage from June to October, 1883, was $14,333,029; and on November 1, 1883, the Secretary of the Treasury states our coin and bullion as follows: United States gold coin, $544,512,699; gold bullion, $61,683,816; United States silver coin, $235,291,323; silver bullion, $5,107,911; total, $846,595,749; showing a net gain in coin and bullion from June 30, 1882, to November 1, 1883, of $146,140,204.

The production of our mines is about thirty-two millions in gold and thirty-five millions in silver—one of the greatest industries of our country to be fostered. In addition to these resources we have exportable and surplus products of immense yearly value, which if the state of trade and our Treasury demanded it would be exported and returns of balances made in gold, thus giving us in a very short time a sure and solid circulation or basis for it. During and since the war we have become so accustomed to the use of paper money that we regard anything else as unhandy and cumbersome. If it be necessary to have a paper circulation, let us have it based upon gold and silver of equal value deposited in the Treasury and subject to the call of the holder of the certificate of deposit. This in my opinion would be the cheapest and best circulation possible to the people of the United States. It would be the cheapest, because the loss of certificates by accident, by fire, and by flood would more than compensate the Government for the issuance of the certificates and taking care of the coin; cheapest, because it would not rely for its security upon a bond of the Government, upon which the people would have to pay interest at 3, 4, or 4½ per cent. It would be the safest system of finance, because the certificate would represent a number of dollars equal to its amount, ready at all times for its redemption. It would not be subject to the fluctuations in value or quantity to which any currency based upon credit is subjected. It would not be subject to be diminished or increased at the pleasure of individuals or corporations to suit their schemes of speculation.

Any system of circulation based upon credit, as our circulation now is, must of necessity be a burden upon the great body of the people (the tax-payers). The use of credit must always be paid for. Our present national-bank notes rest for security upon a credit, a Government bond, upon which the people must pay interest. If we use a Treasury note, it represents a debt of the Government due to the people; it represents the labor or property of the citizen taken by the Government for its use. Bearing no interest and being a legal tender, it partakes of the nature of a forced loan by the Government from the people.

All Government circulation must represent a debt or a deposit. Government is not a bank to loan out its assets or credit, nor is it a charitable institution to give away the property or credit of the people. Its circulation must of necessity, then, go out in payment of its debts or as a certificate of a deposit of which it is the trustee. Now we have the system of debt, but that debt is being rapidly paid. Let us, then, hasten to get to the deposit system, and then utilize for circulation our great wealth of metals.

The accumulation of very large amounts of coin in our Treasury will in times of peace and prosperity be no disadvantage to commerce, to business, or to individual industry and enterprise, and in time of war, in time of panic and financial difficulty, it will be a very great element of strength to the credit of the Government, and will greatly assist in maintaining business enterprises and financial prosperity and the public credit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

During the foregoing remarks, after the expiration of seven minutes, the hammer fell.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to take the floor in my own right, and will yield a few moments to the gentleman from Texas to complete his remarks. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. MILLER, of Texas. I would like to have some ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. BRUMM. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRUMM. I wish to state, Mr. Speaker, that so far in the discussion of this subject the only gentleman who has been recognized by the Chair in opposition to this bill is the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND]. I understand that the gentleman who now claims recognition [Mr. LACEY] is also in favor of it.

Now, the inquiry that I desire to make is whether it is not usual, or at least if it is not according to the established rule of practice that prevails in legislative bodies ordinarily and also in this House, to recognize those persons who are in favor of and opposed to a measure alternatively, that is to say, first one in favor of and then one who is opposed to the bill? There are those who are opposed to this bill and who wish to be heard upon it. I myself am opposed to the bill and wish to ask the recognition of the Chair to be heard in opposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state in response to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the practice of the House has been to recognize, whenever they requested recognition, first the members of the committee from which the measure under debate came and recognize them alternately, that is, first one in favor of and then one against the measure. The Chair has recognized only so far members of the committee.

The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the Chair can not know in advance what position gentlemen will take. But when it can be done the Chair as far as possible alternates among the members in favor of and those opposed to the proposition.

Mr. BRUMM. I understand the Chair then to hold that gentlemen will not be recognized at present except members of the committee until they have all been heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not so stated. In this instance the Chair does not know what position the gentleman from Michigan who now claims the floor will take.

Mr. BRUMM. I wish to state here and now that it is my intention to speak against the bill, and upon the ruling of the Chair claim recognition as one of those who are opposed to the bill when it comes to our side to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan has already been recognized by the Chair. The Chair will of course endeavor to secure recognition for the gentleman from Pennsylvania in opposition to the bill.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of the highest privilege. I move that Mr. SMALLS, a member-elect from the seventh Congressional district of the State of South Carolina, be now invited to the desk and sworn in.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the certificate of the secretary of state of South Carolina to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States of America in the Forty-eighth Congress:

Whereas, in pursuance of the constitution and laws of the State of South Carolina and the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, an election was duly holden on the 18th day of March, in the year of our Lord 1884, in the said State of South Carolina, in the seventh Congressional district thereof, for a Representative of the said State of South Carolina, from the said seventh Congressional district thereof, in the House of Representatives of the United States of America in the Forty-eighth Congress; and

Whereas, upon the examination of the returns of the said election, and by the determination and declaration of the board of State canvassers of the said State, filed and of record in my office, it appears that Robert Smalls was duly elected at the said election, by the highest number of votes, Representative of the State of South Carolina, from the said seventh Congressional district thereof, in the House of Representatives of the United States of America, in the Forty-eighth Congress:

Now, therefore, I, the secretary of state of the said State of South Carolina, by virtue of the power in me vested by the acts of the General Assembly of the said State in such case made and provided, do hereby certify that the said Robert Smalls, at the election aforesaid, was duly elected Representative of the State of South Carolina, from the seventh Congressional district thereof, in the House of Representatives of the United States of America in the Forty-eighth Congress.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of South Carolina, in Columbia, this twenty-ninth day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-four, and in the one hundred and eighth year of the Independence of the United States of America.

[SEAL.] JAS. S. LIPSCOMB,
Secretary of the State of South Carolina.

Mr. SMALLS then appeared at the bar and took the oath prescribed by section 1756 of the Revised Statutes.

THE TRADE-DOLLAR.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4976) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD some remarks upon the pending bill.

There was no objection, and leave was granted accordingly. [See Appendix.]

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, severe illness has prevented me from attending the sessions of this House during the past week, so that I had not the pleasure of hearing the discussion which took place last Thursday on this bill. I shall not detain the House very long, for I am still somewhat indisposed.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] who has just addressed us did not confine himself to the discussion of the provisions of the bill before the House, but rather went into a consideration of the general question of the coinage of the Bland dollar, so called. I would first like to call the attention of the House to the bill under discussion and afterward reply to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND]. It is a bill for the purpose of retiring and redeeming and recoining the trade-dollar.

THE TRADE-DOLLAR.

The trade-dollar was authorized to be coined by the act of February 12, 1873. Section 15 of that act reads as follows:

SEC. 15. That the silver coins of the United States shall be a trade-dollar, a half-dollar or fifty-cent piece, a quarter-dollar or twenty-five-cent piece, a dime or ten-cent piece; and the weight of the trade-dollar shall be four hundred and twenty grains troy; the weight of the half-dollar shall be twelve grams (grammes) and one-half of a gram (gramme); the quarter-dollar and the dime shall be, respectively, one-half and one-fifth of the weight of said half-dollar; and said coins shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

These are all the silver coins which the laws of the United States then authorized. They were all made alike legal-tender, and nothing appears in the act which distinguishes in that respect the trade-dollar from any other silver coin of the United States. Something may have cropped out in the discussion at the time of its enactment which may have indicated that the trade-dollar was calculated and designed for circulation abroad, but certainly the law discovers nothing of the kind.

Under this act, during the years 1874, 1875, and 1876, 15,418,450 of the trade-dollars were coined. It is estimated that of that number two or three millions remained in this country and circulated among the people of the United States. At the time the coinage of the trade-dollar was authorized that coin was worth more than its nominal value in the money of account. In 1876 silver bullion had so depreciated that the trade-dollar was much below par, and then the Congress passed an act taking away from this coin its legal-tender quality, but not disturbing the legal-tender faculty of the other silver coins of the United States. After its legal-tender power had been removed $20,540,910 more were coined, and in 1878 its coinage was entirely done away with by law.

It is now proposed that this silver coin of the United States, which was authorized by an act of Congress and was made a legal tender as all other silver coins were, shall be redeemed; that it shall not be permitted to circulate among the people and be a means of deceiving the ignorant and the unwary. This bill provides that this trade-dollar shall be received for all Government dues, that it shall be redeemed by the Treasurer and all the assistant treasurers of the United States, and that when so received for dues, or so redeemed, it shall be recoined into the standard silver dollar, and that the trade-dollars shall, when received at the coinage mints, be applied upon and counted as part of the monthly purchase of silver bullion.

WHAT WILL PREVENT LARGE IMPORTATIONS.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] asks what will prevent the trade-dollars now held abroad from being reshipped to the United States, and why are not chopped or defaced coin excluded? I would say that of the 35,959,360 trade-dollars originally coined there were exported up to the 1st day of November, 1878, $25,703,950, and there were taken abroad by individuals, and not passed through the custom-house, an estimated amount of $5,000,000, leaving in the United States on the 1st day of November, 1878, 5,255,410 of these trade-dollars. For the years 1878 and 1879 the importation of this coin is estimated by the best authorities at $2,000,000. The net imports, according to official figures, during the year 1879-'80 were 739,679; and during the year 1880-'81, 92,377. There were exported in 1881-'82 3,600 of these dollars, and in 1882-'83 1,000 of them; leaving now in the United States, according to these figures, 8,082,866 trade-dollars.

You will notice that in this computation nothing is deducted for those which may have been melted down, or which may have been used in the arts and manufactures; so that these figures can not be exceeded, while the amount actually in the country may prove to be considerably less. We therefore say that we are within bounds when we claim that the number of these trade-dollars to be retired can not now exceed $8,000,000.

The figures which I have given with regard to the exportation and importation of trade-dollars indicate that we have not imported any since 1881. For three years none have been imported, notwithstanding the fact that from July, 1879, to July, 1883, they were at all times worth in New York 99 cents, the price paid there by the bullion brokers. Let me repeat, that from July, 1879, soon after the legal-tender quality of this coin was taken away, down to July 1, 1883, there was never a time when these trade-dollars would not command in New York 99 cents on the dollar. Now, if there were any abroad which were not defaced and mutilated——

Mr. HERBERT. Does the gentleman mean to say that the market price of the trade-dollars was 99 cents?

Mr. LACEY. It was up to July 1, 1883; since that time there has been a fluctuation. I was about to say that 99 cents having been the price paid for these trade-dollars in New York city from July, 1879, to July 1, 1883, if there had been any of these dollars abroad which could have been shipped to this country and sold they would have come here prior to that time. What are the facts? Instead of these coins coming to this country, where they could have been sold for 99 cents, we find that during the last two years, 1881-'82 and 1882-'83, there was an actual exportation instead of an importation. The flow of these dollars from the east to America stopped two or three years ago, and we are now shipping them abroad. This the committee take as a demonstration that the recoinage of these dollars into standard dollars will not bring in any from abroad.

DEFACED COIN EXCLUDED.

It is reported that of those which went abroad to India and China over twenty millions went into the melting-pot, having been used as bullion at the mint in Calcutta. Those which have not already been melted down in those countries are undoubtedly chopped, marked, or otherwise defaced, and those so defaced we claim are excluded from the operations of this bill by the provisions of existing laws.

WHY NOT CONFER THE LEGAL-TENDER QUALITY?

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] further asks, "What would be gained by having these trade-dollars recoined? And why not simply make them a legal tender?" There are two objections to that course. In the first place, it would be unwise in the present condition of the monetary affairs of this country and of the whole world to confer the full legal-tender faculty upon the trade-dollars now in the United States, and thus add instantaneously, by a stroke of the pen, as it were, $8,000,000 to the already dangerously large volume of full legal-tender silver, thereby precipitating the calamity which we believe to be impending and which wise statesmanship should strive to avert.

The second objection is that we would then have two legal-tender silver dollars in circulation of different sizes, of different weight, and bearing different devices, the one worth perhaps 87 cents in money of account and the other 89 cents as silver is quoted to-day. We can not believe that this House is prepared to introduce into our coinage system such an anomaly, and one so confusing and unintelligible to the class of people who will chiefly use this class of coin, especially when uniformity can be secured without loss.

THE TRADE-DOLLAR DISCREDITED.

I have stated that up to the 1st of July, 1883, the trade-dollar was worth 99 cents in the city of New York. At that time a concerted movement was made against this dollar; an agreement seems to have been made on all hands to discredit it. Hence it dropped to its bullion value substantially. During July, 1883, its value in New York was 86 to 87 cents; in August, 87 to 88 cents; in September, 88 to 89 cents.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman be kind enough to tell us by whom this "agreement" was made? Who agreed to discredit this dollar?

Mr. LACEY. I am not able to do that.

Mr. BRUMM. Was it not the money-changers and brokers and bankers who did it?

Mr. LACEY. My understanding of that matter is precisely this: that it had been the custom of certain manufacturers to go to New York and elsewhere and buy these trade-dollars at a discount, take them out to the manufacturing and mining towns, especially in Pennsylvania, and pay them out at par to the miners and laborers and artisans; that at the date I have named, the 1st of July, 1883, somebody had come to the conclusion that this thing had gone on long enough, that these people were not to be cheated and defrauded in that way any longer.

Mr. BRUMM. Who were those who came to that conclusion?

Mr. LACEY. I can not say. I have not the information. I presume it was the miners and artisans and laborers who agreed to take this stand, because they were the persons who had been systematically swindled by these operations, and who will continue to be swindled in the same way just so long as this coin, the mintage of the United States with the size and appearance of a dollar, bearing the statement that it is a dollar, is allowed to float about the country.

But thus this dollar has passed into the hands of laborers, miners, and other classes of employés. In some places these men have been able to use these dollars for purposes of trade; in others not. In my own portion of the country a large quantity of this coinage is floating about in the hands of farmers, laborers, and others, who can not pay it out at par, and who therefore must take it to the broker. The broker can not pay out these dollars, and consequently buys them at such a discount as will permit, without loss, his keeping them on hand for a few days or weeks or months, until he has a sufficient quantity to be profitably shipped to New York to be sold. The price paid in different parts of the country at the period I speak of ranged all the way from 85 to 95 cents on the dollar.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LACEY] yield for a motion to adjourn? He will have the floor when the House takes up this subject again.

Mr. LACEY. I prefer to finish my remarks to-night; I do not care to occupy much more time. But, Mr. Speaker, I will inquire whether if I yield for a motion to adjourn this bill will come up after the morning hour to-morrow or will it be subject to the question of consideration?

The SPEAKER. This bill will be the unfinished business after the morning hour to-morrow; but it will be in order then, as it was to-day, to make a motion to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering appropriation bills.

Mr. LACEY. I prefer, then, to go on to-night.

IT SHOULD BE RETIRED.

Mr. Speaker, I think upon all accounts it is the duty of this House to pass this bill providing for the retiring and recoining of this trade-dollar. As a question of honesty this House can not afford to defeat this bill. So long as this discredited coin floats about the country, so long will it be used as a means of cheating and defrauding the ignorant and unwary, who can be so easily deceived by what appears to be and what once was a genuine legal-tender dollar of the United States.

I will not attempt to go on further with those provisions contained in the first three sections of the bill, but will notice the third question which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] propounded.

IS IT PROPOSED TO STOP COINING THE BLAND DOLLAR?

"What is the purpose of the fourth section? Is it to stop the coinage of the standard dollar?" Mr. Speaker, that brings me to the discussion of the question which was so thoroughly traversed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND]. That gentleman objects to the fourth section of this bill and proposes to strike it out, because he says it will delay the coinage of the standard dollar. He says it will prevent the purchase of bullion by the Government for four, five, or six months. I am willing to concede that the effect of the fourth section will be to, in a greater or less degree and for a short time, interfere with the monthly purchase of bullion. That brings us to the direct question whether we prefer that those who own silver bullion should wait two, three, four, or five months for a market, or whether it shall be those who hold these trade-dollars, the tradesman, the artisan, the laborer, the miner, and the mechanic. The latter have held these trade-dollars for eight years, while these bullion men have had the benefit of a market created and sustained by the enforced monthly purchases by the Treasurer of the United States by virtue of the Bland law, and at the expense of other producers equally worthy of Government aid.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND. Would you vote to make the trade-dollar a legal tender and let it go right on?

Mr. LACEY. I would not.

Mr. BLAND. That is the difference between you and me.

Mr. LACEY. Yes, that is the difference. You are in favor of inflation.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman stated that it was a question whether the holders of trade-dollars should succeed and others should wait.

Mr. LACEY. The holders of trade-dollars will not wait under the fourth section. I will reply to your question. The gentleman says that by making them a legal tender the holder of the trade-dollar will not have to wait. While I am in favor of protecting the holder of the trade-dollar, while I am in favor of doing everything proper to make a market for the producer of silver bullion, I can not afford to do it at too great a cost. The question as to whether silver shall continue indefinitely to be coined as a full legal tender in this country, whether there shall be free coinage of silver in this country, is one we should meet now. It is upon us; it is of great importance, and we ought to be willing to give some little time to hearing it discussed in this House.

The gentleman from Missouri says that he is willing to make these dollars a legal tender. That would add to our present enforced yearly coinage of 28,000,000 an additional eight or ten millions more of Bland dollars. I am not willing to vote for that.

If this fourth section should be stricken out and if these trade-dollars which are retired should not be applied on the monthly purchase of bullion I should be obliged to vote against the bill, because I think the duty I owe to the great interests thus placed in jeopardy would be paramount, and I should better serve the poor man and laborer by voting against a measure which is destined to lead us by accelerating speed to a debased and depreciated currency, which always falls with direst force upon the wage classes.

THE PRESENT CONDITION OF THE SILVER QUESTION.

What is the condition of the silver question in the world to-day? The gentleman from Missouri demands free coinage of the Bland dollars of 412½ grains, worth 87 cents in the market. I ask that gentleman if there is a civilized nation on the face of the earth to-day that is coining silver except for subsidiary purposes? There are only two places in the world, to wit, Mexico and India, where there is free coinage of silver to-day. The great powers of Europe are limiting their coinage of silver to the amounts necessary for subsidiary purposes. And the great tendency among European nations is toward monometallism or a single gold standard, with silver as a temporary or subsidiary accompaniment.

AN INTERNATIONAL RATIO AND FREE COINAGE.

Now I say to the gentleman from Missouri if an arrangement can be brought about between the great powers of Europe and the United States whereby a common ratio can be established between gold and silver with free coinage of both metals, I am for it with all my heart. But I ask whether there is any probability that such an agreement can at present be secured? I point the gentleman to the three conferences which have been held upon the subject within the last few years, beginning with the conference of 1867. What were the results of these conferences?

Mr. BLAND. Let me interrupt the gentleman to state that the difference between us is simply this: that I am satisfied our country can take care of her own coinage, and by restoring silver to its proper position will bridge over the difference now existing in the value of silver and gold bullion.

CAN THE UNITED STATES ALONE SAFELY ADOPT FREE COINAGE?

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman says the difference between us is that he affirms and I deny the proposition that this nation can take care of itself. I was just about to point him to certain facts in connection with that very matter. I say that there have been three international conferences upon this subject, and I wish to say that they were called by those who were in favor of bimetallism, in favor of the free coinage of gold and silver upon some agreed ratio; and yet, among the whole number of those participating from the beginning to the end, no man was found who dared to proclaim such views as those which have been just expressed by my friend from Missouri, that is to say, that this nation, or even this nation and France combined, could safely take that position. In point of fact many of the persons who attended these conferences doubted whether this nation and the Latin Union with England and Germany added could safely adopt such an agreement and enter upon the free coinage of silver——

Mr. BLAND. Let me interrupt the gentleman——

Mr. LACEY. And the delegates from the United States in the last conference, and they were able men, too—Mr. Evarts, Mr. Thurman, Mr. Howe, and Mr. Horton—all men of world-wide fame, who desired bimetallism, who were asking for an international ratio and the free coinage of silver, each and all are on record as plain as words can speak to the effect that it would be senseless, nay, worse than senseless, for this nation alone, or for this nation and France combined, to undertake to make an agreement as to an international ratio and the free coinage of silver under any circumstances.

Mr. BLAND. Does not the gentleman know that France kept them at par as long as her mints were open?

Mr. LACEY. What was the gentleman saying?

Mr. BLAND. I say that France kept the two metals at par for seventy-five years—silver and gold—and could have done it up to this day but for her desire to spite Germany in changing her monetary regulations.

Mr. LACEY. If the gentleman would simply ask a question I would gladly yield, but he must remember that my time is fast expiring. The gentleman is correct in saying that the French ratio was maintained for many years, but it miserably fell just as soon as the other great powers stopped the free coinage of silver.

CONFERENCE OF 1867.

Now, to resume: In 1867, at the time of the Paris exposition, twenty nations were represented in a monetary conference held in Paris, the United States being one, and this was the unanimous decision of that body:

Arrived at the conclusion that a basis for the monetary unit of the future should be sought in the gold standard, with silver, if need be, as a temporary companion.

That memorandum was adopted by twenty nations in 1867 without a dissenting voice. Then began the series of movements which led to the great depreciation of silver. This conference of 1867 was the outgrowth of the opinion which had long been taking hold of European financiers, that wise statesmanship required a suspension of the free coinage of silver; it had become too bulky. It had become obnoxious to the people. This was soon after the great Australian and California mines had begun to deluge the world with gold, and they were under the impression that there would be gold sufficient for the monetary purposes of the whole civilized world. There was a corresponding indisposition on the part of the people to use silver, which was so much more bulky, and they desired a gold standard. This gave form to public opinion upon the subject to a very great extent, and led everybody to look toward the single gold standard as the true solution of a problem which the world had never solved.

GERMAN DEMONETIZATION.

In 1870 and 1871, as it will be remembered, Germany took the initiative and wholly demonetized silver. The Scandinavian nations—Denmark, and Sweden, and Norway—soon followed, and after these the states of the Latin Union took up the subject and limited the coinage of silver, and thus completed its utter discomfiture by striking it down in the house of its friends. All the states of the Latin Union—France, Belgium, Italy, Greece—all of them, restricted the coinage of silver, and for the first time in history. So that the tendency among the nations of Europe from 1867 to the present time has been uniformly and steadily in the direction of restricting the coinage of silver and toward the adoption of gold monometallism.

CONFERENCE OF 1878.

Eleven years had passed under this new order of things, when in 1878 a new conference was called at Paris by the United States. Sixteen nations were represented. A full discussion was had, and this was their conclusion:

That it is necessary to maintain in the world the monetary functions of silver as well as those of gold, * * * but that the differences of opinion which have appeared, and the fact that even some of the states which have the double standard find it impossible to enter into a mutual engagement with regard to the free coinage of silver, exclude the discussion of the adoption of a common ratio between the two metals.

Consequently everything fell to the ground. Without the adoption of a ratio agreed upon between these high contracting parties all was lost. It was said the coinage of silver must be limited or stopped entirely.

CONFERENCE OF 1881.

This conference of 1878 was followed by that of 1881, to which I have alluded, when the United States and France combined for the purpose of calling an international conference which should establish an international ratio between the two metals. In calling the conference to order, M. Magnin, of France, the minister of finance and the president of the conference, said:

In order that the metal silver may recover its former value it is indispensable that it should be, as in the past, freely coined side by side with gold, and as no state either wishes to stand or could stand alone in resuming such coinage, it is absolutely certain that we shall not find our way out of the present difficulties until an international bimetallic treaty shall have been concluded.

The gentleman who said this was the president of that conference, he was the friend of bimetallism, one of those at whose suggestion this conference had been called, and yet he says:

No state either wishes to stand or could stand alone.

M. Pirmez, of Belgium, a delegate from that country, said:

To resume the free mintage of silver without the co-operation of states now having the gold standard would be risking a disaster. Nobody therefore ventures to propose such an experiment.

This was the language of the delegate from Belgium. Now here is the language of the delegate from France, M. Cernuschi, who is the friend of bimetallism and its most prominent champion all the world over. What does he say?

The success of the conference and the fate of bimetallism then only depended upon Germany and England. If these two join France and the United States, bimetallism becomes the monetary law of the world. If one of them should join, it would still be possible; if both should refuse their co-operation, it would be condemned to remain impracticable.

That is the language of one of the most earnest and most able of all the advocates of bimetallism.

Now what did Mr. Evarts, who went there to secure bimetallism, say? He says this:

The problem that was too much for any one nation—the problem of a fixity of ratio between silver and gold, which should make one money out of the two metals for all the world, was to be made the subject of joint consideration by the nations most interested in that problem.

The most important expression in this statement is this:

The problem that was too much for any one nation.

Mr. Evarts distinctly recognized that. And yet the gentleman from Missouri claims we should adopt our own policy, that this Government alone and single-handed should solve this great problem for the whole world.

What did Mr. Thurman say at the same conference? He said this:

Were a great group of the states of Europe and America to form and maintain a bimetallic union, such as that supposed in the question, would the result be a great stability in the relative value of coined gold and silver?

In my humble judgment that would certainly be the result of such union, provided Great Britain and Germany were parties to it.

Now, Mr. Thurman was as earnestly for bimetallism as the gentleman from Missouri can be or as any man in this House, and he went there with the earnest purpose of bringing about a common ratio between the two metals and the free coinage of silver; and yet he announces that without the co-operation of Great Britain, Germany, France, and the United States this must be a failure.

Then what says M. Dumas, another delegate, from France, who earnestly advocated bimetallism and free coinage? Upon this question, as to whether this nation or France or both combined or united could handle this problem, he says:

If one should say to-day "there is a nation which has the pretension, in the present state of the civilization of Europe and of the rest of the world, with the facilities of communication existing between all countries and with the enormous extent of commercial relations between one nation and another, there is, I say, a nation which has the pretension of fixing this ratio," it would be senseless.

That is the opinion of M. Dumas. And he was one of the delegates from France, a country loaded up with silver, struggling and pleading for the free coinage of the two metals on a common ratio. And yet he says it would be senseless for any one nation to attempt it. And does M. Dumas know anything about the question? He says further:

Whatever nation should undertake it would be punished for its presumption. A ratio of this kind can only be effectually adopted and permanently established when great nations, representing numerous populations, submit themselves to such a rule.

These, then, are the opinions of the men who represented the United States and other nations in this conference of 1881, the last one which has been held, and which assembled under the bill introduced by my friend from Missouri himself and which passed by his vote and that of others who share his views. These men, representing his opinions and representing the opinions of all who desire bimetallism and free coinage of silver, are on record unanimously against the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri.

Now, it seems to me perfectly clear that any one who has investigated this matter will agree with me when I say that it is futile, it is dangerous, it is an act of desperation to continue on and adopt free coinage of silver in this country unless we can be joined by at least France and England and Germany?

FREE COINAGE IN INDIA AND MEXICO ALONE.

What is the fact to-day? As I asserted a few moments ago, there is not a civilized nation, at least in Europe, coining silver to-day, except in very limited quantities and for subsidiary purposes.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is not India coining more silver than the United States?

Mr. LACEY. I said "European nations." There is free coinage of silver in India, as there is also in Mexico, but nowhere else. Are we to put ourselves in that category of nations? Let me call your attention to the states which are to-day using silver.

NATIONS USING GOLD STANDARD.

The States which are under the gold standard to-day are Great Britain, Germany, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Portugal, Turkey, Egypt, Canada, Brazil, Liberia, and Australia. Those States are using silver, but only in a subsidiary capacity. That is to say, they have a gold standard, the silver coin being in fact redeemable in gold, so far as exchanges are concerned. The nations of the Latin Union are put down as bimetallic, yet we know that gold is practically the standard in those countries.

NATIONS USING A DOUBLE STANDARD.

Gold and silver are the standard in France, Italy, Spain, Belgium, Netherlands, Switzerland, Greece, Argentine Republic, Chili, Venezuela, Cuba, Hayti, and the United States.

NATIONS USING THE SILVER STANDARD.

Silver alone is the standard in Austria and Russia, in Europe; of Tripoli, Mexico, Bolivia, Ecuador, Peru, the United States of Colombia, India, and Japan.

Mr. BLAND. I think the gentleman fails to mention India, which has over a billion of dollars of silver currency and 700,000,000 of population.

Mr. LACEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I put in India with $1,200,000,000 of silver currency.

Mr. CHACE. Will not the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] take off two or three hundred millions from the population of India?

Mr. BLAND. No, sir; I include all the Asiatic nations.

Mr. LACEY. Of all these nations which I have enumerated only four coined any silver whatever last year. Spain coined a small amount of subsidiary silver; India coined silver as usual, and so did Mexico. Spain and the United States were the only nations, outside of those two, which coined any silver last year. Of all the remaining thirty-five states which I have enumerated, but two are coining any silver outside of India and Mexico.

Yet the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] wishes us to enter into this fight single-handed, and to provide for free coinage of silver in the United States.

RESULT OF FREE COINAGE IN THE UNITED STATES.

What would be the result of that course? All the states of Europe are desiring to exchange their silver for gold. Of the $2,700,000,000 of silver coinage in the world to-day, $1,200,000,000 are held in India, and fifteen hundred millions are held in Europe, the United States, and the various American states. Of that $1,500,000,000 a certain amount is necessary for subsidiary coinage. They would use in that way perhaps $500,000,000, and that would leave $1,000,000,000 to be emptied into our laps and to draw off our gold in exchange therefor. We would export $600,000,000 of gold and import a like amount of silver.

Now, what is going on to-day? We are exporting $10,000,000 of gold a month, and we are buying each month $2,000,000 worth of silver bullion of the bonanza-mine owners, and in that way we keep the silver bullion from being exported. If we were not providing a fictitious market for silver bullion in this country it would go abroad and pay our debts, and the gold would remain here at home. But the monthly purchases for the mintage of an obnoxious coin make a forced market for silver bullion in this country, and our gold, which all desire, is sent abroad to pay our debts.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Does the gentleman hold that unlimited coinage of silver in this country would induce France to send her silver here?

Mr. LACEY. Most assuredly it would.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think not.

Mr. LACEY. France would retain only enough for her subsidiary coinage.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And would the surplus come here?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly it would.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Would it be to the interest of any Frenchman to withdraw silver coin from the currency of France and send it here if we had free coinage in this country?

Mr. LACEY. Most assuredly.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Not at all. It would not be to the interest of any Frenchman to withdraw from that country the silver coinage.

Mr. LACEY. The balance of trade must be settled either by gold or by silver. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] must understand that France has shipped to us within the past five years many millions of dollars of gold coin to settle for her breadstuffs. I pretend to say that with free coinage of silver in this country the coin sent to settle accounts with this country would be of silver, instead of gold, as heretofore, and the tendency and final result would be for the United States to receive all the surplus silver of the world and other nations would take all our gold.

GREAT CHANGE IN DEMAND AND SUPPLY.

What is the fact in relation to this silver question? Are there any great changes going on in the world to bring about these dangers with which we are surrounded?

I find that in the semi-decade from 1852 to 1856 there was annually produced in the world $145,000,000 worth of gold and $40,500,000 of silver, or the proportion of $100 of gold to $28 of silver. In the next semi-decade, 1857–'61, the production was $127,184,000 of gold and $41,220,000 of silver, or the proportion of $100 of gold to $32 in silver. In the next semi-decade the proportion of production was $100 of gold to $39 of silver; from 1867–'71 it was $100 to $43, in 1872–'76 it was $100 to $62, in 1877–'78 it was $100 to $69, in 1879 it was $100 to $77, in 1880 it was $100 to $90, in 1881 it was $100 to $95, and in 1882 the production was in the proportion of $100 of gold to $106 of silver, as will be seen by referring to the table published with my remarks. This statement shows that from 28 per cent. in 1852 and 1856 the product has increased to 106 per cent. in 1882, and at the same time an indisposition to use this metal for coinage has appeared all over the world.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman state the proportion of silver to gold in the production during the first half of the century?

Mr. LACEY. It is not included in these figures; I have not the data at hand.

Mr. CASSIDY. The gentleman will allow me to say that his statement is misleading, because this change in the relation of the two metals comes from the falling off in the production of gold.

Mr. LACEY. And from the increase in the production of silver.

Mr. CASSIDY. The production of silver has passed the maximum.

Mr. LACEY. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon. The production of silver in 1882 was $109,000,000, the largest amount the world has ever produced in a single year. The production has risen from forty millions in 1852 to one hundred and nine millions in 1882.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Does the gentleman mean to say that the present relative value of gold and silver depends upon the relative production of the two metals?

Mr. LACEY. I say that it depends upon demand and supply.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is correct.

Mr. LACEY. And while the production of silver has increased the demand has decreased.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mainly as the result of legislation.

Mr. LACEY. Certainly. If the gentleman can get an international agreement established by diplomacy and legislation, so as to provide for the free coinage of silver and gold upon a fixed common ratio, I am for that and with him. I think that would solve the whole difficulty. But to attempt to continue the coinage of silver without such international concurrence is simply madness.

Not only has this great disparity appeared in the production of these metals, but there is a greater disparity in the consumption in the arts and manufactures. Of the $103,000,000 of gold produced last year $75,000,000 were used in the arts and manufactures, as estimated by the Director of the Mint, leaving us only about $30,000,000 to be used by the whole world for coinage; whereas of silver only $35,000,000 were used in the arts and manufactures, leaving over $60,000,000 to be used in the world for coinage. Yet, with this deluge of silver impending, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] is in favor of the United States stepping forward, single handed, and taking up the free coinage of silver. I say this is worse than idle—it is suicidal.

WHO WOULD BE BENEFITED?

What are the interests to be benefited by such a course? The mining of silver has necessarily fallen into the hands of large corporations, possessing vast wealth, and the demand is that the bonanza princes who are producing this silver shall be specially favored and protected; that we shall make a market for their product at the risk of depreciating the whole volume of the currency of the United States 15 per cent.

Now, suppose by allowing the trade-dollars presented for redemption to count as a part of the monthly purchase of bullion a depreciation of 1 or 2 cents an ounce in the value of silver bullion would result, how much will that amount to upon the whole annual product of $46,000,000? The effect would be relatively infinitesimal.

WHO WOULD BE INJURED?

But suppose we go on and add at one stroke $10,000,000 to the present volume of silver coinage, and by this suicidal course precipitate a depreciation of 15 per cent. in the whole currency of the country, what would be the result?

We find that the first to suffer and the last to receive help when inflation or debasement of coin has brought about depreciation of the currency are the laborers and the wage classes. According to the official figures we find that in the United States during the census year, 1879, 2,738,930 laborers were employed in manufacturing operations, receiving $947,919,674 in wages. Now, I have gone on and taken the figures as to agricultural laborers, domestic servants, and laborers not specified, as well as one-half of those employed in trade and transportation; and adopting substantially the same basis of wages as is shown to have been received by manufacturing operatives, I find the wages of all these would amount to more than $3,000,000,000. This vast sum is no doubt much less than the sum actually paid as wages in the United States during a single year. Now, if we should cut down the purchasing power of our currency 12½ cents on the dollar, the reduction upon this amount of wages would be $387,000,000—a total loss to the wage classes in one year of an amount equal to eight years' output of all the silver mines in the United States. Now, in order to make a market for $46,000,000 of silver bullion—that is, to increase its price by 1, 2, or 3 cents an ounce—are you willing to risk precipitating a loss of $387,000,000 annually upon the laborers, the wage-receivers of the country?

Everybody knows that if the currency of our country were based on silver—if a dollar of 87½ cents were substituted for a dollar of 100 cents—the rate of wages now paid would not for years advance to such an extent as to counterbalance this reduction. It is equally well known that all property of a commercial character would instantly advance to fully meet the depreciation. Every article the laborer and his family consumes would go up at a single bound, but his wages would advance if at all at the end of a long and painful struggle. It would be a fight of individuals against corporations, of large numbers without organization against firms and corporations whose managers think quickly and act promptly. This, it seems to me, would make the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri appear ridiculous if we are able (as I think we are) to demonstrate that the continued and increased coinage of the Bland dollar would precipitate a fall to the silver standard and bring about the depreciation resulting therefrom.

But that is only one of the effects it would cause. That applies not only to wages, but to fixed values and to fixed incomes and to the great mass of the commercial transactions of the country, which are beyond all computation.

WHAT MAY BE SAFELY DONE.

There are only two ways in which silver coin can now be safely used as money. One is by an international ratio between gold and silver fixed by the leading nations of the world and that followed by free coinage as a full legal tender; and the other is, failing an international agreement, to use it as subsidiary coin or for local purposes, or, as you may say, for domestic and internal purposes. In my judgment we have already coined in this country all that is necessary for use under the second proposition, and without an international agreement it is the only way we can now legitimately and safely use it. We have to-day about $255,000,000 of silver of all coins in this country. That is more than sufficient for all subsidiary purposes; it is more than sufficient for all circulation below $5.

NEW MEASURE PROPOSED.

I had the honor of introducing a bill on Monday last which it seems to me would prevent any danger from using the present stock of silver dollars. It reads as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That on and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to print and issue Treasury notes of a smaller denomination than $5.

SEC. 2. That any holder of standard silver dollars or silver certificates may deposit the same with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States in sums of not less than $10, and receive therefor silver certificates of the denomination, at his option, of $1 or $2.

SEC. 3. That whenever the standard silver dollars in the Treasury not held for the redemption of silver certificates of the denominations of one and two dollars shall exceed the sum of $20,000,000, the Secretary of the Treasury may suspend the coinage of standard silver dollars provided for in the act of February 28, 1878, during the period such excess continues to exist.

SEC. 4. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

It provides, as you see, for retiring all Treasury notes below $5; for issuing one-dollar and two-dollar silver certificates, and for suspending the coinage of the Bland dollar whenever the silver in the United States Treasury not necessary to protect the one-dollar and two-dollar certificates shall exceed the sum of $20,000,000. That would make silver perform all the purposes necessary for money below the denomination of $5, and relieve us from any danger of being precipitated to a silver standard.

On the 1st day of November last there was in circulation in the United States—

|---|---|
| One-dollar notes | $30,785,265 |
| Two-dollar notes | 27,510,196 |
| Standard silver dollars | 40,334,932 |
| Total | 98,630,393 |

Under the provisions of the bill introduced by me, as will be seen, the silver dollar, or its representative certificates in denominations of one and two dollars, could be utilized to the extent of $98,630,393, or in round numbers say $100,000,000. These dollars or small certificates would go into the pockets of every person between the two oceans for every-day use in the current daily small transactions. Nobody deposits in banks these small notes, and no banker ever transports them to his correspondents in the commercial cities. Therefore $100,000,000 of silver dollars and silver certificates would be diverted permanently from the great channels of trade, and would cease to imperil the medium by which the banks in the redemption cities settle their clearing-house balances or with which the Government is to pay the interest on or the principal of its bonded debt. In this manner the present volume of silver might be safely utilized, provided its further coinage should be suspended until there was further demand for these certificates of small denominations.

IN CONCLUSION.

But, Mr. Speaker, to return to the proposition under discussion. What good reason can be given for striking out the fourth section of the bill now before the House, as is proposed by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND]? I think it is sufficiently established that, according to all recognized authorities, even among the most sanguine adherents of bimetallism, free coinage of silver in the United States under existing circumstances is monetary suicide, and not to be thought of for a moment. It seems to me equally true that continued coinage under the Bland bill of 1878 will in due time, at a slow pace to be sure, but just as certainly in the end, bring this nation to the same disastrous condition. Are we then to look with any degree of favor upon this amendment, which will double the number of Bland dollars during four or five months to come, which are now required to be coined, and thus double the pace by which we are now approaching monetary disaster? Are we to stand out alone in this fatal attempt to stem the tide of destiny? Are we to continue to listen to these false prophets of the silver god? Have they not deceived us in the past? Did they not tell us in 1878 that the passage of the Bland bill would bring back silver to its old-time parity with gold? Has this proved true?

Why, sir, on the day the Bland bill became a law silver bullion 1000 fine was worth $1.208 per ounce in the city of New York, and the 412½ grains of standard silver contained in the Bland dollar was worth 93.46 cents. On the 12th day of the present month the same silver had declined in the same market to $1.12 per ounce, and the bullion value of the same dollar was but 87½ cents. In the mean time the world's product of silver has increased, as compared with gold, from 69 per cent. in 1878 to 106 per cent. in 1882. The relative proportion of silver to the entire stock of coin held in the Treasury of the United States has increased from 17 per cent. in 1878 until it is now 41½ per cent., and the consumption of India, the only considerable market in the world left open for the surplus product of the silver mines, has fallen off from $73,331,675 in the year 1877–'78, to $19,462,870 for the year 1880–'81. These facts speak more forcibly and eloquently than can any words of mine. And I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that no one regrets that they do so speak more keenly than I do.

I am anxious to utilize every ounce of silver that we can and avoid disaster. I believe that bimetallism and free coinage of both the yellow and white metal is greatly to be desired, provided the great powers of the earth will join in the adoption of that policy and agree upon a common ratio. But, sir, all our attempts in that direction have so far proved futile, and such being the case, only one road leads to safety, and that is not to be found by adopting the legislation proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], which will increase instead of diminish the coinage of the standard silver dollar.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. COX, of New York, moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. DOWD. At the request of several gentlemen I now give notice that at the expiration of one hour and a half of further general debate, to be equally divided, I shall move the previous question.

Mr. BRUMM. We have had but one hour on our side and you have consumed all the other time.

Mr. CASSIDY. I ask the gentlemen to withdraw the motion to adjourn, as I wish to claim the floor.

Mr. COX, of New York, and Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania, withdrew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Mr. Speaker, I regard the bill under consideration of considerable importance—important in that it seems to embody the integrity and fair-dealing of the Government with the citizen. It is not, sir, in my mind, a measure that addresses itself to the craft of the statesman nor the philosophy of the lawmaker; it seems shorn of these features of high distinction and levels down to a plain question of common honesty. The trade-dollar, to which it relates, has been the occasion of much annoyance to our people, and of pecuniary loss to very many of them who could illy afford to sustain a loss. For both this annoyance and loss the Government is at fault and responsible.

In what I shall say in the remarks I am about to make I may depart from the higher line of debate which usually characterizes discussion here. If I shall be unfortunate in this respect I invoke the indulgence of the House.

At any rate, sir, I shall not presume in the least to deal with the collateral questions which deeper thinkers might choose to bring in review with this bill—the effect of tariff duties on commerce, the monetary standards of nations, the policy of bimetallism or of monometallism, nor the ratio of value between them; nor the history of the currency of other nations, nor the conventions between nations on the subject of currency.

I will not attempt to illustrate any of the relations of domestic or foreign trade—how to regulate it to restore and control balances. All these questions have had their day in court, and have been discussed upon this floor to exhaustive completeness. It will be my purpose simply and solely to recall the relations and responsibility of the Government to and with the trade-dollar and the duty now resting upon the Government to its citizens in regard to it.

This coin which the bill proposes to redeem and retire was made under and pursuant to a law enacted by Congress. It was worked at the mints of the Government. It was stamped with the die-imprint of its press. It carries the devices put upon it by our direction, and down to the time it was by a second act of Congress demonetized and bastardized it was part of our legal silver currency. It is confessed that as a coin of the Government it was an anomaly from its creation. The standard of the silver dollar had been established, as to the metals composing it, its fineness, and its weight for years before the trade-dollar was authorized to be coined.

When the necessity or desirableness of an additional coin of like exchangeable value of the silver dollar impressed itself upon the judgment of Congress, it was deemed proper, perhaps important, for some reason to depart from the usual, if not the uniform, practice of nations having metal money, in only making pieces of like value in the markets and exchanges of commerce to be of like fineness and same weight; and there was accordingly put in and added to the new coin 7½ grains more of silver above what had been the standard of the silver dollar of the country, the value of which as money it was not in any sense to exceed.

In attempting to discover the reason which induced the Forty-third Congress to pass the act authorizing this item of currency which the honorable Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report submitted to the present Congress, says "is to be blindly sought for in tradition or in the record of congressional discussion and is indicated in the joint resolution of 1876, which took away from this coin the legal tender quality of it and held down the coinage of it to the call for it for exportation," I beg to occupy the attention of the House for a moment while I recall, in part, the history of the silver-money coinage of the country.

The question of currency and what shall constitute it has at all periods of time, in connection with the affairs of nations, been the subject of earnest and learned discussion. It was impinged by necessity upon the deliberations and consideration of the eminently wise gentlemen who framed our Constitution. They knew well that a government without a money medium and currency of its own could not claim the dignity and recognition of a power among nations, and therefore provided, "Congress shall have authority to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures."

Congress did accordingly in 1792 declare of what the currency should consist, namely, of gold and silver, and defined the denominations of the coins of each precious metal, and established the fineness, the weight, the form, and the device of each.

The character and quality of the coin having been regulated by enactment of law, we may presume that the issue of the coin will be regulated by two more especially controlling circumstances—the demand for a circulating medium to effect and facilitate commercial exchanges between the people at home and between them and the people of foreign countries; and, secondly, by the supply of the metal that composes the coin.

The intrinsic value of the coin will necessarily be affected by a full or deficient supply of the metal out of which the coin is made, especially if the metal is an article of art commerce.

At the time of the passage of the act establishing a mint and defining the metal currency, it will be remembered that Mexico was the chief silver-producing region on our continent. Her mines were vigorously and successfully worked. Their yield was molded into the Spanish milled dollar, which coin, with its pillared subsidiaries, was the principal silver coin circulating in the thirteen United States.

It was important, therefore, that the silver ingredients of our dollar should be made to approximate, as near as it might, to the silver in the fresh-coined Spanish milled dollar.

And it will be seen by reference to the act of April 2, 1792, it was ordained "that the dollar or unit shall each be of the value of the Spanish milled dollar, as the same is now current, and to contain four hundred and sixteen grains of standard silver."

The necessity of this equalization of intrinsic value is patent. Exchanges between the people of the same as well as with those of foreign countries of their respective commodities is not only desirable as a means of mutual benefit, but is often demanded to contribute to the comfort or to minister to the wants and necessities of mankind.

These exchanges can not at all times be effected by barter—by trading one commodity for another. Often the thing sought can only be obtained for a money consideration. This fact existing, and the payment being made in silver units equal in face value to a similar unit of the foreign country, the necessity of equal intrinsic value of the respective units is imperative.

Fiat can not create value. It will not increase nor can it secure circulation of currency created by it, at least not outside the country issuing it, and only within the limits of its boundary by reason of a supervening necessity. The coin must possess the intrinsic commercial value of its corresponding and correlative coin of foreign creation.

Wide inequality could not long exist in this respect if the coin were by consent interchangeably received. It would be but little space of time before the coin of largest intrinsic value would find its way to the melting-pots of the small-value coin, and the currency of the one country would dwindle and disappear with rapid celerity, while the other would increase with even greater rapidity, and without new supply from the mines.

It was for reasons like these that the character of the coin was established as in the act recited.

Much of what I have said may, Mr. Speaker, be entirely elementary in political economy and therefore axiomatic; but it is both experience and the truth nevertheless.

I believe an examination of the statistics at large will show that the original definition of the silver dollar continued unchanged until 1837. In that year, presumably from the fact that silver bullion existed only in a limited amount, and that the native silver dollar had ceased to circulate or had been recoined into more convenient shape, the weight of the dollar was reduced from 416 to 412½ grains troy of standard silver.

It will be discovered by referring to the records of the mints that during this period of forty-odd years there were but $1,440,517 silver dollars coined. Of this amount $1,439,517 had been coined as early as 1806, and the remaining $1,000 were coined in 1837.

The first coinage under the new-weight act was (unless the $1,000 in 1837 was under the act) in 1839, when $300 were minted, and from thence continued each year, except 1858, until 1873 inclusive, during which period the coinage, together with that under the first act, amounted to the sum of $8,045,838—the entire coinage of the silver dollar of the country down to eleven years ago. At this point the issue of the trade-dollar began, and from 1873 to 1878, the last inclusive, the whole sum of the trade-dollar issue was struck, amounting to $35,846,838, as appears from the following table:

The act of February 12, 1873, under which the trade-dollar was struck and put upon the market, was in substance: The silver coin of the United States shall be a trade-dollar, a half-dollar or 50-cent piece, a quarter-dollar or 25-cent piece, and a dime or 10-cent piece; and the weight of the trade-dollar shall be 420 grains troy; the weight of the half-dollar shall be twelve grams and one-half gram; the quarter-dollar and the dime shall be respectively one-half and one-fifth of the half-dollar.

This, I believe, is the first departure from the English nomenclature of weight-measure in connection with our silver coin.

The average American scholar knows quite well what the weight-measure of 420 grains troy is. He does not know quite so well what 12½ grams are. This is too much French for him. He may find after protracted search that a "gram" equals 15.432 grains troy. He naturally supposes and expects to find that 12½ grams will equal 210 grains troy, one-half the silver in the trade-dollar. Such, however, does not prove to be the fact, and this strategy in the use of borrowed means of expression indicates strongly a purpose to conceal a supposed disturbing truth.

The act of 1873 provides:

> The silver coin of the United States shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

The legal-tender feature of the trade-dollar was continued until 1876, when Congress by its joint resolution enacted—

> That the trade-dollar shall not hereafter be a legal tender, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to limit from time to time the coinage thereof to such an amount as he may deem sufficient to meet the export demand of the same.

This coin was evidently, as this resolution indicates, intended and made expressly for foreign market and circulation. The legal-tender quality gave it motive power. It was accepted by foreign countries as money of the United States. Unfortunately, it permitted and secured current circulation at home. Its emasculation by withdrawing from it its legal-tender quality demonetized it, as had the act creating it demonetized the standard dollar of 1837, the latter being resurrected by the coinage act of 1878.

Nevertheless both continued to circulate together in the interim, and also after that act under which the immense issue was put out, which now is the occasion of great alarm to the trading and banking classes. This was perfectly natural and to be expected, and would continue to be the fact at this time were it not for the glut of the 412-grain dollar. When this came the time had arrived for the actual demonetization, and this coin quickly became the rejected of all, and was refused as a circulating medium at rates below its bullion value for recoining into small coin.

It is very proper, Mr. Speaker, in view of the provisions of this bill, to inquire what has become of this coinage. Where are those trade-dollars now?

I find from the report of the Director of the Mint submitted to Congress in 1879, at page 192, that the exportation of the trade-dollar to the far east of Asia from 1874 to October, 1879, was $27,089,817. Certainly a fair measure of success had been attained in the original purpose of exportation. It would ordinarily be expected that the main purpose of coinage would be to obtain a fitting medium, and that successful business pursuits and a healthy condition of finance would be illustrated by the fact that the precious-metal money was retained at home.

Business did not depreciate in 1879; but after the act of 1878 creating the new dollar the demand for circulation of the trade-dollar ceased. The purpose of the act of 1873 was to get rid, in a specious manner, of surplus silver bullion.

I avail myself of a table prepared by the compiler of the American Almanac, from official reports, and therefore semi-official and entirely correct and reliable, showing the production of the precious metals at home as bearing upon and tending to show the influence and motive that led to the making of this meddlesome dollar.

It will be observed from the statement contained in the table that the production of silver from 1849 to 1858 was, by estimate, about the sum of $50,000 per annum, or half a million all told; before that period it had been very much less.

*From 1849 to 1858 the estimated product of silver was $50,000 per annum. The silver mines of the United States were discovered in 1859.

In the following year the rich fields of silver deposit began to be discovered and developed, increasing tenfold the first year, and from the third year thereafter increasing regularly in volume until 1882, when it had reached the sum of $46,800,000.

The yield in 1868 was $12,000,000, or two hundred and forty times that of 1847. The yield of 1873 (the birth of the trade-dollar) was seven hundred and twenty times the amount of 1847. The entire yield down to 1882 is $550,972,260; while the total coinage of silver of all denominations from the establishment of the Mint till 1882 has been $376,612,662.55. More or less of this amount was, without doubt, recoinage of depreciated coin, and perhaps more or less of foreign coin and bullion.

It is not open to doubt that this rapid increase in the production of silver bullion, going so far beyond the demand for consumption in manufacture, and the arts, was the chief occasion of the authorization of the trade-dollar.

The probable continuance of the yield determined by estimates carefully made on explorations and data established by the output of worked mines disclose not alone the motive that led to the issue, but also what induced the measures adopted to persuade the trade into the channels of foreign commerce. It was to be rid of the certain surplus and to shed it in such way that it would not return. This end was adroitly consummated, first by increasing the silver ingredient seven and one-half grains beyond that of the theretofore standard dollar.

The far East was to be the field of operation. The demand for silver dollars there was known to exist. Merchandise was waiting to be exchanged for our money. Our choice was optional as to kind, whether payment should be made in gold or silver, of home or foreign mintage. Our selection was of course determined by the production of our silver mines, deluging the markets with their yield. This was the determination of the citizen silver miner and importing merchant combined. The trade-dollar was contrived and adopted as the medium, the Government being the willing abettor to the transaction.

The increase in weight of component silver was rightly conceived and correctly estimated as the proper method by which to reach and capture the cupidity of our proposed customers. It proved a tempting bait. But one other element was needed to be added to give it character and conceal the purpose of its issue. It must have a currency quality, a current value, and be placed on the same footing as that of its less plethoric predecessor, the standard dollar. It must be a legal tender for like purposes and for like amount. This quality was unhesitatingly added and gave it life and power.

I read from the table prepared by Mr. Burchard, Director of the Mint, which shows the result of this well-planned device and the successful consummation of the purpose conceived.

To repeat, from 1874 to and including the month of October, 1879, $27,089,817 of these trade-dollars had found a market in foreign countries, principally Japan, China, and India. At that date there was left at home the balance of the coinage, about $7,869,543. It appears from the last annual report of this officer, who certainly is entitled to great credit for his evident diligence in a wide scope of inquiry, the details of his compilation, and the correctness of his conclusions, that the balance at home has since been reduced to $7,000,000, a statement which seems to be in harmony with the views of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Where, Mr. Speaker, is this home balance? In whose keeping are these $7,000,000? There can be but one response as to the great mass of them. They are in the pockets of the laborer, the till of the small trader, or the stocking of the thrifty housewife, waiting the day of their redemption. There are many reasons why this conclusion should be reached. There is a natural avidity in the masses, generated by curiosity, patriotism, or whatever it may be called, to become possessed of any new coin or coin of new device issued by the Government. It is very well known that it is not unusual for new coin to sell at a premium, and when the trade-dollar was issued it is reported as having been worth in fact $1.04 paper currency.

A further fact consisted in the untiring effort and persistent energy on the part of the first holder to divest himself of his needless ware. This first holder was the ore-producer or the bullion-broker. They had the bullion coined in order to enable them to get rid of it, and to them it mattered little in what manner it was effected so long as it brought return, nor in emergency would they hesitate for reason of the possible effect upon the remaining unmined metal or the money interest of the country.

Up to July, 1876, $15,631,000 of these dollars had been coined. Only $12,269,108 had been exported, leaving $3,361,892 in home circulation; more than one-half the amount in hand to-day.

To put out this money all avenues were availed of, though perhaps not all equally acceptable. On the one hand foreign purchase and exportation in payment; on the other the paths of industry at home. The employer in his relation to the employed, the coal fields, the large manufacturing and money corporations, were the ready abettors in the scheme. Even banks became disbursing agents. These dollars were freely used to pay workingmen and as a substitute for small-bill currency. The employed had no great reason to complain, no valid legal ground to refuse to accept it. It was legal-tender down to that time, lawful pay for more than his day's earning and perhaps his whole week's wages. They passed current at the grocery, the market, and the store for the gross sum of all his purchases. His employment may have depended upon acceptance, hence circulation was easily effected. Being established, it continued and grew upon itself. The first three and a half million were capable of enforced circulation; the remaining three and a half million were put in circulation clandestinely, under cover, and by reason of absence of any conceivable ability to detect them from the former. They were not counterfeit; they were the lawful work of the mints of the Government. There was no crime committed, no offense against law perpetrated, in putting them into circulation.

For this and its accompanying possibility and the evils attending it the Government is primarily responsible. It vitalized the dollar as a medium. It put upon it all the badges of legitimacy and honest paternity. Why, sir, read this statute:

> Upon the coins there shall be the following devices and legends: Upon the one side there shall be an impression of Liberty, with an inscription of the word "Liberty" and the year of the coinage; and on the reverse shall be the figure or representation of an eagle, with the inscription "United States of America" and "E pluribus unum" and a designation of the value of the coin; but on the gold dollar and three-dollar piece, the dime, five and three cent piece, the figure of the eagle shall be omitted, and on the reverse of the silver trade-dollar the weight and fineness of the coin shall be inscribed.

And more: with an insidious suggestion of high purpose in the Government the obverse bears the inscribed motto, "In God we trust," arched with the emblematic stars of the original thirteen States of the Union. "In God we trust"—for what? In this connection seemingly that the trade-dollar may avail itself of liberty, vouchsafed by fraudulent device, at least to wing its flight upon the back and by means of the strong pinions of America's ægis bird from out the ark of the American mint, but, obstructed by more than forty days' deluge of crude silver ore, not to return to a home haven of rest forever more. To this end there was not a sign omitted, not an act left undone, so far as the Government could impress or perform, to give the coin credit or currency. It was accepted by the laboring classes and the masses of the people generally and freely; if not freely, by compulsion.

The law provided:

> Any owner of silver bullion may deposit the same at any mint to be formed into bars or into dollars of the weight of 420 grains troy, designated in the title as trade-dollar, and no deposit of silver for other coinage shall be received.

The kings of the silver mines were certainly in favor, but not sufficiently so to satisfy their convenience and greed. The next seemingly unjustifiable action taken by Congress in connection with this coin was the passage of the joint resolution of July 22, 1876:

> The trade-dollar shall not be hereafter a legal tender, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to limit from time to time the coinage thereof to such an amount as he may deem sufficient to meet export demand for the same.

It has been claimed that this resolution was a notification to the world that this coin had ceased to be money of the Government, and whoever received it thereafter took it at bullion value and not face value. Concede it; what then? So far as foreign countries were concerned it was public notice by which they were bound.

But not so in regard to citizens at home. I know it has been asserted upon this floor in a past Congress that "all these coins held at home were put in circulation months after they had by this resolution ceased to be a legal tender." I do not know by what authority of fact that declaration was made.

But on the theory of home circulation to which I have alluded it is a moral certainty that the pieces then circulating would continue to do so, and the whole balance of the $7,000,000 now in the hands of the people could be placed there without possible knowledge in them that it was the issue subsequent to July, 1876. They then are the innocent and unestopped victims of this wrong made possible and permissible by Congressional legislation.

This resolution, Mr. Speaker, seems to the superficial observer at least to be another step in the interest of the bullion producers alone and to the exclusion of all others, except perhaps the speculators in the demonetized coin. By that resolution the trade-dollar ceased to be honest money. To be sure, its coinage might be continued. To counterfeit is a crime; but it was not money. Why did the people accept it and continue to use it? It must be borne in mind that the time was not in the long past when the sight of a silver dollar was a luxurious feast for the eye to behold, when brass tokens stood in place of gold and silver, and pasteboard shinplasters had held the credit and confidence of the people in petty business exchanges, no matter by whom put out.

It is not, sir, a surprising fact, nor a justification for inaction now, that the trade-dollar continued to circulate after its demonetization. To most, I doubt not, the passage of the resolution was unknown, or, if known, forgotten. It did continue to circulate, and so long as it passed for money at its nominal face value the fact of its debasement made no practical difference to the impecunious holder; its use was not immoral; to them it was the bird of passage, in hand to-day and out by necessity on the morrow. It came to them as a dollar; it went from them as a dollar. It would be doing the same errand to-day had it not been necessary to extend further and additional favors and privileges to the bullion-holding millionaires.

In ante-bellum times the clipped sixpence and shilling of Mexican stamp, the punched quarter-dollar and fifty-cent piece were seldom refused at face value in trade. So this, of more intrinsic value than the new legal-tender standard dollar, would have gone its round as money.

Was it not in the interest and for the benefit of those same mining companies and by their appliances that the act of February 28, 1878, became a law? Did they not procure the—

> Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be coined at the several mints of the United States silver dollars of the weight of four hundred and twelve and one-half grains troy, of standard silver, as provided in the act of January 18, 1837, on which shall be the device and superscription provided by said act; which coins, together with all silver dollars heretofore coined by the United States of like weight and fineness, shall be a legal tender at their nominal value, &c.?

Here was in one respect an act of justice performed. The dollars demonetized by the act of 1873 were rehabilitated and re-established as legal money, necessitating their acceptance as money by the Government.

But the end is not yet reached. This act of 1878 further provides:

> And the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase from time to time silver bullion at the market price thereof, not less than two million dollars' worth per month, and cause the same to be coined monthly, as fast as so purchased, into such dollars.

Is it necessary to ask or answer the question, in whose interest was this legislation? The trade-dollar act coined for the bullion-owner, to export to foreign markets, to get rid of as best he might. Did not the Government need silver-dollar money then as much as in 1878? A foreign market was found for part of the hoard. The coin was demonetized to prevent its return. The foreign demand was supplied and the coin rejected.

But, sir, the mountains continued to give forth sounds of busy workmen and truck-loads of silver ore. The glittering nuggets without a market brought no benefit and proved of little worth. A market is sought; a customer is found. The Government itself ceased to be a minting agent and became a minting owner of immense blocks of silver, and from that day to this the crucibles have sweat and the dies have creaked without intermission, and the bins of the Treasury vaults are strained to bursting from the pressure of 130,000,000 of these dollars, without any demand for them.

With this glut, this deluge of $2,000,000 every thirty days, money owned and sought to be forced out by the Government, is it to be wondered that the banks refused to receive as long as they could not be compelled to take the trade-dollar in payment or otherwise? The stores in self-preservation were compelled to follow the example of the banks, and soon the infamous trade-dollar was "respected by none, rejected by all," and would not sell at the assay office for even its bullion value.

I say the victims of this wrongdoing are the toiling, honest poor of our population. To them are to be added the outcoming immigrant to our shores. He is being plied by speculators in this base coin, to exchange before taking, or while on, ship his coin of fatherland, which he is told will be useless or inconvenient to use here, for these tokens of "In God we trust." That organized bands of these fratricidal speculators do exist has been heralded daily through the press. They have become so flagrantly vicious in their purpose and methods as to necessitate action by the State Department, which I am informed hast sent instructions to consuls and consular agents at the German ports to omit no effort to suppress it. I do not care to discuss this moral crime against the ignorant and unsuspecting in his property nor the manifold greater crime against the law-abiding and law-confiding citizenship of these States.

Can the Government afford, in view of its future well-being, to permit these practices to continue at the expense of its honor, its fair repute for honest dealing? Will it tolerate this conspiracy and traffic, even in the spurious money of its own coining, to defraud honest labor at home or to beguile and betray the immigrant seeking a home as a citizen among us?

Has not enough been done by Congress for the few recipients of immeasurable favor to permit, to demand it to do one little duty-imposed act for and in the interest of the people? The Treasury vaults inlock 130,000,000 silver dollars coined from material bought from these few with interest-paying bonds and higher-grade currency of the country and for which no demand exists. Is it too much to ask that there be taken from this useless mass 7,000,000 pieces and with them redeem these trade-dollars honestly earned by the sweat and aches of the toiling drudge, but nevertheless a man for all that and the peer of any of the silver kings, and when this exchange may be effected and an imperative duty performed with so little cost to the Government? I think computation shows that each fifty-five trade-dollars will make fifty-six standard dollars.

But the friends of the bullion aristocrats and seemingly autocrats say this will interfere with the coinage of $2,000,000 monthly of the bullion of their friends. They do not forget that the Government is directed to purchase that amount of bullion and melt it into dollars; for this payment is to be made at market rates and in fact in high grade currency, which will soon be transferred into interest-paying bonds. Why do they not add, what they know is truth, that this monthly increase is to be drayed to the Treasury and dumped into the vaults necessarily enlarged to receive, and there to rest indefinitely without opportunity of being used or made useful? If it be true that it will interfere one hundred days, what of it? Did it stop that purchase and coinage for all time I should not object, if its stoppage was necessary to the doing of this act of justice.

It seems to me, sir, that there is no ground for apology, no conceivable excuse to relieve the Government from this pressing duty to redeem this coin promptly and at its face value and with the least possible inconvenience to the holder.

A refusal to do this act of justice smells like repudiation, a repudiation that would be as pitiable as it would be parsimonious. It matters not what may have been the motives, the moving forces (and I do not hint at vicious appliances or unlawful practices), that brought about the enactment of these laws. In that of 1873 the faith of the Government was plighted, and its pledge must, in honor, be redeemed. Were it oppressed by poverty, an exhausted Treasury, and a clamoring debt it would not be justified for dishonorable neglect. But, sir, its coffers are full to repletion. It seeks relief from the load of surplus on accumulated revenue in extravagant largesses under the guise of charity. Let justice be first done, then if we choose we may be generous.

The measure is pressed from all sections of the country and all classes of people. The President deemed it worthy of mention in his message and recommended the withdrawal. He says:

> The trade-dollar was coined for the purpose of traffic in countries where silver passed at its value as ascertained by its weight and fineness. It never had a legal-tender quality. Large numbers of these coins entered, however, into the volume of our currency. By common consent their circulation in domestic trade has now ceased, and they have thus become a disturbing element. They should not be longer permitted to embarrass our currency system. I recommend that provision be made for their reception by the Treasury and the mints, as bullion, at a small percentage above the current market price of silver of like fineness.

The Secretary of the Treasury in more elaborate phrase reports and urges. I read from his report:

> As it is a coin of the United States, having the image and superscription thereof, sanctioned as such by penalties upon the counterfeiting of it, and once dignified as a legal tender in payment of debts and dues, it should be restored to its first state or called in at its nominal value and melted. In the judgment of this Department it should be thus called in and melted.
> It is possible to make an estimate of the amount that would come to the Treasury for redemption if authority were given therefor. The whole issue of the coin has been $35,960,446. Some of that has disappeared in manufactured articles; it is estimated from one to two millions. It is calculated that five-sixths thereof went abroad in the beginning, and it is believed that but a small part of that has come back, and that there is now held by our people but from five to eight millions. Of that which remained abroad, there is good authority for saying that much of it found its way from China to India and into the melting-pot at the mint in Calcutta, and has been there cast into the coin of that country. The overweight and value of the trade-dollar by the side of the Mexican and Spanish dollar, with which it was cocurrent in China, brought much of it to the crucible there. It is understood in business circles that in China silver coin is used by weight and not by count, save in a few ports, where Mexican dollars and a few other coins are taken by tale. It is the practice of Chinese bankers, so it is reported, to stamp with their own mark the coin which they take and pay out. The coin thus defaced soon comes to the state and repute of bullion, and the presumption is that our trade-dollars have, many of them, been so treated and so suffered.
> Bear in mind, too, that from time to time for some years past, until of a comparatively late date, there has been inducement to reship this coin from China hither, because it has been free in circulation in most parts of the land and for most of the time at par with gold and silver money. There is reason to believe, then, that besides the sum of it in the hands of our own people an embarrassing amount will not come to us from abroad.
> A thorough and effective redemption of it can be brought about in this way: Let authority be given by Congress to the Treasury Department to barter for trade-dollars at their nominal value standard dollars at their nominal value, and melting the trade-dollars to recoin them into standard silver dollars, counting the trade-dollars got in this way as a part of the silver bullion which the act of 1878 empowers and directs to be bought and coined monthly. Should the trade-dollars have been so abraded in use as to have lost a material part of their original weight, which is not much to be apprehended, a deduction might be made from the price, and fractional payments made in subsidiary and minor silver coins.
> It has been stated above that there is cause for belief that much which has gone abroad has put off its character of a coin of the United States, and so is not able in that guise to come back for exchange. If, however, a serious apprehension is felt that it will return in embarrassing volume, the time for the exchange might have a narrower limit, and instead of a twelvemonth, a quarter of a year be the period fixed. This Department would rather see all the trade-dollars that are afloat anywhere brought in and made bullion of, even at a cost to the Government, if thus we may be rid of a discredited and debased coin; but if this may not be, it still will wish that those in the hands of our people be redeemed in the mode recommended, with safeguards against foreign holders. If it be urged that, whatever be the sum redeemed, there will be a loss to the Treasury in recoining the trade-dollars as bullion into standard dollars rather than in purchasing bullion in the market at ruling rates and coining it under existing law, it may be answered that the excess of silver in the one over that in the other will be nearly if not fully enough to pay the cost of the manipulation; and, again, that the seigniorage or profit now got from buying bullion at, for example, 99.8 per standard ounce, and issuing the same in nominal dollars at the rate of, say, 116$\frac{1}{16}$ per standard ounce, is only a seeming total profit of the difference; for in the redemption of the coin, which must be looked for and provided for as to sooner or later come, the Government must, as a rule, take it back at the same nominal value at which it was put forth.

The Director of the Mint says in his official report:

> I would respectfully recommend—
> Third. The repeal of the act authorizing the coinage of the trade-dollar.
> While the United States has incurred no legal liability, yet by the act of the Government the coins were at first put into circulation and given compulsory currency, and have fallen into the hands of those who can ill afford to suffer from the depreciation, and it would seem but an act of justice that the United States should permit these coins to be sent to the mints and exchanged for other silver coins, into which they could be profitably recoined.
> I doubt not that action of this kind would have long since been taken but for the apprehension that a large number of exported trade-dollars would be returned to this country. My own investigations and inquiries have satisfied me that the trade-dollars sent to China have gone to the melting-pots and become sycee-silver or disappeared in the interior of that country; for, although their value as silver bullion would be only about 87 cents, yet their commercial market value in New York city has, prior to the late movement to depress their price, fallen below 98 cents but once, and that for a short period, and has usually ranged for several years above 99 cents, and had it been possible to secure trade-dollars for import from China to this country, the profits on the operation would have brought them here long since.

I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee on Coinage would find it practicable to propose to receive this coin at its face value in payment of all dues to the United States in the same manner and to the same extent as any other silver coin of the United States, and when received to retire and recoin the same into any authorized coins of the country. I availed myself of the privilege on the first call for bills and introduced a bill for that purpose. I was aware of the fact, as the statement already made shows the fact to be, that this dollar can be converted into subsidiary coins at a profit beyond the expense attending the transformation. Assistant Treasurer Acton, if correctly reported, asserts this as a fact and explains—

> A trade-dollar contains 420 grains of pure silver. Now, suppose we chose to recoin into regular legal half-dollars. The weight of two half-dollars would be 385.8 grains. Therefore the trade-dollar would weigh 34.2 grains the most. This would give a profit of about 8 cents in the coinage of the trade-dollar into fifty-cent pieces.

And yet, sir, notwithstanding the profit in the recoinage, when this amount of precious metal, emblazoned with "In God we trust," is offered at the assayer's office 86.63 cents is the sum total the owner can obtain therefor.

But, sir, I am entirely willing to waive any choice of preference as to the manner of redeeming and withdrawing or recoining. I care nothing for the detail in this respect. To accomplish the act of redemption is with me the desire paramount.

Since the pendency of this bill before the House for its consideration this slip comes through the post:

NEW YORK, March 14, 1884.

Editor American Grocer and Dry Goods Chronicle:

I hold about fifty trade-dollars, taken in payment of goods sold upon the basis of one hundred cents to the dollar. I now find myself holding a money that my Government pledged itself to pay by permitting it to be coined and circulated as legitimate value. I feel our Representatives in Congress should rescue the faith of the Government by providing for its liquidation.

W. S. HARTT.

There are a great many traders similarly situated. It is a shame that the Government should hesitate to retire the $8,000,000 or thereabouts of trade-dollars now held by the people. They were once a legal coin, so recognized and accepted by the Government. Its action gave the people faith in the coin. They can be retired with but little loss, and the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury to that effect should be adopted.

Yes; let the coin be redeemed. Let our faith be rescued. Let the country be rid of this demoralizing quantity in finance. If it will be attended with a loss, the country can well afford to and can easily bear it. The much-talked-about and seemingly deplored surplus in the Treasury may properly and constitutionally be applied to this purpose.

We gave a few days since a half million dollars for the relief of citizens of States well able to take care of their own poor and unfortunate. The suffering occasioned by the devastating overflow of the Ohio River did not permit a pause or inquiry for warrant.

A little before we gave the half of that sum, to be augmented a hundred times in amount, to experiment in endeavoring to exterminate a disease common to cattle the world over—a disease known to have existed for more than 2,000 years.

Our charity and philanthropy will be as mockery and hypocrisy if we refuse to supplement them by this act of simple justice, the prompt redemption of this our coin.

Mr. CASSIDY. I claim the floor, and will yield to the motion to adjourn.

On motion of Mr. COX, of New York (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 1, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 28th ultimo, a statement showing what amount of the war tax of 1861 is due and unpaid, from what States due, and the portion thereof which has been paid by withholding moneys due to the States from the General Government; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 28th ultimo, copies of correspondence between the Departments of Justice and the Interior as to the present efficacy of the act of March 3, 1807, for the removal of persons and obstructions from the public domain; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 2334) to release the American Baptist Home Mission Society from the conditions of the sale of the marine-hospital building and grounds at Natchez, Miss., was read twice by its title.

Mr. GARLAND. I ask that the bill may lie upon the table, and after the morning call of business I shall ask the Senate to take it up for consideration. It will take only a moment or two, but I will not ask it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be laid on the table for the present.

The bill (H. R. 5255) for the relief of the heirs of John S. Fillmore, deceased, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. 116) for the relief of the sureties of the late J. O. Rawlins was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. 1327) for the relief of J. H. Hammond was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Claims, if there be no objection.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should be glad to have the bill referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. That committee has charge of the subject. There is such a bill now pending before it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 2240) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Assistant Engineer John W. Saville a passed assistant engineer on the retired-list of the Navy was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 3936) for the relief of Benjamin F. Millard was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. 254) granting a pension to John Robbins;

A bill (H. R. 267) granting a pension to James King;

A bill (H. R. 282) to reinstate Cornelius Fitzgerald on the pension-roll;

A bill (H. R. 297) granting a pension to Violet Calloway;

A bill (H. R. 394) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary C. Jones;

A bill (H. R. 1024) granting a pension to Charles B. Duncan;

A bill (H. R. 1075) granting a pension to Caroline Lauffer;

A bill (H. R. 1246) granting a pension to the widow of Maj. Gen. James B. Steedman;

A bill (H. R. 1397) granting a pension to Albert O. Laufman, late second lieutenant of Company A, Sixty-third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. 1491) granting a pension to Sarah L. Harvey, mother of G. B. Harvey;

A bill (H. R. 1504) for the relief of Millia Staples;

A bill (H. R. 2284) granting a pension to Elizabeth Fowler;

A bill (H. R. 2319) granting a pension to Laurena C. P. Haskins.

A bill (H. R. 2325) granting a pension to Helen M. Harrison;

A bill (H. R. 2551) granting a pension to Charles Munroe;

A bill (H. R. 2714) to increase the pension of Thomas E. Wilson;

A bill (H. R. 3625) granting an increase of pension to Levi Anderson;

A bill (H. R. 4141) for the relief of Mrs. Rebecca J. Pierce;

A bill (H. R. 4234) granting a pension to Mary Ullery;

A bill (H. R. 4368) granting an increase of pension to Dr. Samuel Davis;

A bill (H. R. 5335) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah E. E. Seelye, alias Franklin Thompson.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented resolutions adopted by the senate of the State of Kansas urging the passage of Senate bill 1587, authorizing the settlement of the claims of certain citizens of Kansas named therein; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. GORMAN presented the petition of W. H. Norris, cashier of the Western National Bank of Baltimore, and others, citizens of Baltimore, Md., praying for the refunding of certain taxes alleged to have been unlawfully collected; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PLUMB presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kansas urging an appropriation for the payment of sufferers from the raid of Cheyenne Indians across the western part of Kansas in 1878; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the senate of the Legislature of Kansas in favor of the passage of the bill providing for the payment of losses sustained by citizens of Kansas as found by a commission appointed in 1859; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRYE. I present a memorial of the mail-carriers of the city of Lewiston, Me., remonstrating against the reduced appropriation for that service. It is addressed to me, but evidently intended for Congress. I ask that it may be received and move that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. I present the petition of the New York committee for the prevention of State regulation of vice, officially signed, praying that the jurisdiction and powers of the National Board of Health be specifically defined and limited. I do not know what committee would have jurisdiction of the subject. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as it involves a change of law.

Mr. GARLAND. The petition should, I think, go to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases instead of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FRYE. I have no objection to that reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the petition will be referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

Mr. MORGAN. I present the petition of William Webster, a citizen of the United States, born in Maine, praying the assistance of Congress in the recovery of what he claims to be his just rights in a body of land comprising 500,000 acres, in New Zealand, which he claims that he bought from the native chiefs before the British Government acquired any possession or right of possession in that country; that his rights have not been respected by the British Government either in reference to the land or the timber upon it or in respect to compensation for the damages that he has sustained. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES presented resolutions adopted by Tippecanoe Post, No. 51, Grand Army of the Republic, of Monticello, Ind., urging legislation in regard to pensions and bounties to ex-Union soldiers; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL presented resolutions of Harrison Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Pennsylvania, in favor of the passage of a bill for the equalization of bounties and certain pension bills; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of Ingham Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Canton, Pa., praying for the passage of certain pension bills; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of inventors, manufacturers, and others, of Erie, Pa., remonstrating against the passage of House bills 3925, 3934, and 3617, and Senate bill 1558, in relation to patents on inventions; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of wool-growers, farmers, and other citizens of eastern Ohio, praying for the passage of an act restoring the tariff on wool, fixed by the act of March 2, 1867; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. M. H. Dunn, widow of the late Col. E. W. Dunn, fleet-paymaster of the Mississippi squadron, United States Navy, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR. I present the petition of Charles Watson, of Lowell, Mass., praying for compensation for his services to sick and wounded Union officers and soldiers in Libby prison hospital during the year 1864. This petition is in aid of a bill which has been already introduced. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER presented the memorial of David Ward, of Detroit, Mich., remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill 1441, authorizing the construction of bridges across the Great Kanawha River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LAPHAM presented the memorial of Edwin C. Litchfield, of New York city, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. 1886) to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of 158 citizens of Union, Oreg., praying that women be granted the right of suffrage; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HALE. By direction of the Committee on Appropriations I report the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, with sundry amendments. I ask that the bill and report be printed, and give notice that I will call it up, with the leave of the Senate, to-morrow, or next day at the farthest.

Mr. BECK. What was the notice the Senator gave? I did not hear it.

Mr. HALE. That I will, with the leave of the Senate, call the bill up to-morrow, or next day at the farthest; probably on the next day.

Mr. MAXEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 657) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust and settle the expenses of Indian wars in Nevada, to report it back with a recommendation that the bill be indefinitely postponed, and with the statement that the report is not upon the merits but because it is believed that the act approved June 27, 1882, making provision for the State of Nevada and other States and Territories, is sufficiently broad to cover the purposes of this bill. We know of no other construction placed upon it by the War Department and the proper accounting officers of the Treasury.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1304) to authorize the Secretary of War to ascertain the expenses incurred by the Territorial authorities and the people of the Territory of Idaho in the suppression of Indian hostilities in the years 1877 and 1878, known as the Bannock and Nez Percé outbreaks, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HAMPTON. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 779) for a survey and estimates for a railroad from the mainland to Key West, Fla., and for a canal connecting the same with the Saint John's River, for military and naval purposes, to report it adversely. I move its indefinite postponement.

Mr. MORGAN. Let the bill go on the Calendar.

Mr. CALL. I desire to have it placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. VOORHEES, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 535) for the relief of the sureties of George F. Elliott, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SEWELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1614) vacating the Fort Hartsuff and Fort McPherson military reservations, in the State of Nebraska, and restoring the same to entry, to report it adversely. A general bill having been reported to the Senate which takes in all the abandoned military posts, I move that this bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 14) for the relief of Mrs. Jane Venable, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1360) giving a pension to Mina M. Gwynn, of Kansas City, Mo., submitted an adverse report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1144) granting a pension to John W. Wright, submitted an adverse report thereon.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that that bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Capt. Anson Northrup, of Minnesota, praying compensation for expenses incurred and services performed during the rebellion and in the Indian war in Minnesota in 1862, have instructed me to report the same back to the Senate adversely and to recommend that the prayer of the petitioner be not granted. There is no bill with it.

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask that that case be placed on the Calendar, if there be no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no bill, and consequently the case can not be placed on the Calendar. The adverse report has all the facts in it. It is a long report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves that the adverse report of the committee be agreed to.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let that motion lie over for the present, if the Senator from Missouri will consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be placed on file.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1744) for the relief of Mrs. Martha L. Burch, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1724) to authorize the Secretary of War to deliver certain cannon to the Saratoga Monument Association, reported it adversely; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a petition for the establishment of a soldiers' home west of the Mississippi River, have instructed me to report the same back to the Senate and to ask that it be laid upon the table, as the Committee on Military Affairs have already reported a bill (S. 1404) to authorize the location of a branch home for volunteer disabled soldiers in either of the States of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the petition and it will be placed upon file.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Jefferson Fields, praying to be allowed a pension, to report the same back with a statement that the case is now under consideration before the Commissioner of Pensions. I ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1114) granting an increase of pension to William Shannon, submitted an adverse report thereon.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that the bill be placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

OHIO MUSTER-ROLLS.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 210) requiring the Secretary of War to furnish copies of certain muster-rolls to the governor of the State of Ohio, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will venture to ask the Senate to pass the joint resolution reported by the Senator from Illinois. I will simply say that the Legislature of Ohio have ordered the publication of the muster-rolls of the regiments in the late war from Ohio, and it is necessary to have the copies of certain rolls that are on file here to supply a defect in the rolls at Columbus, Ohio. The passage of this resolution will enable the publication of the document to proceed. It is a matter of local interest and yet at the same time delay might be inconvenient. I trust the Senate will pass it now. The reading of the joint resolution will show its nature and I have said all that need be said in explanation of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the Senate now consider the joint resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be read in full.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, required to furnish to governor of Ohio, upon his request, copies of such muster-rolls as are filed in his Department, and other information from the records of his office as may be necessary to complete the military history of the troops that entered the service of the United States from the State of Ohio during the Mexican war and war of 1861.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the Senator from Ohio will consent to call that up after we pass through the morning call. I object to its consideration now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to postponing its consideration for a few minutes. It is a mere matter of convenience to the State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will go over for the present.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HILL introduced a bill (S. 1967) regulating the letting of mail contracts in Alaska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1968) to make the certificates of gold and silver deposited in the Treasury of the United States a legal tender for public and private debts; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GROOME introduced a bill (S. 1969) granting a pension to William T. West; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GROOME. A citizen of my State thinks that she has a valid claim against the Government of the United States, and in order that it may be inquired into by the appropriate committee of the Senate I ask leave to introduce a bill, that it may go to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (S. 1970) for the payment of certain coupons of certain Indian war bonds of the State of California was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 1971) granting a pension to Catharine H. Glick, widow of Elias B. Glick, late surgeon of the Fortieth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 1972) for the relief of Edway A. Grant; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KENNA (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1973) to remove the disabilities of Robert D. Thorburn; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ALLISON introduced a bill (S. 1974) to amend section 4488 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER introduced a bill (S. 1975) authorizing the Court of Claims to take jurisdiction of and adjudicate the claim of the Piedmont Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ALDRICH introduced a bill (S. 1976) for the relief of Young Brothers, of Newport, R. I.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARRIS introduced a bill (S. 1977) for the relief of Emerson P. Randle, of Tennessee; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (S. 1978) authorizing the partition of certain land in Louisville, Ky., belonging jointly to John Echols and the Government of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 77) granting one month's extra pay to certain officers and employés of the Senate; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. RIDDLEBERGER, it was Ordered, That the petitions and papers of the Methodist Episcopal churches of Arlington, Falls Church, Fairfax Court-House, Dumfries, and Mount Crawford, in Virginia, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. VOORHEES, it was Ordered, That Mrs. Jessie Benton Fremont have leave to withdraw her petition and papers from the files of the Senate, under the rules.

Ordered, That Mrs. Mary L. Hawthorn have leave to withdraw her petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

MARSHALS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, 1. That the Attorney-General of the United States is directed to inform the Senate whether a vacancy exists in the office of marshal of the middle and southern districts of Alabama; and, if so, how such vacancy occurred, and how long that office has been vacant.

2. Whether the duties of that office are now being performed, and by what person, and under what authority he is acting, and from what date he has been so acting.

3. And that the Attorney-General will further inform the Senate whether the person who is exercising the duties of said office was at the time of his appointment thereto, or at any subsequent time has been, indicted for any, and what, crimes in the courts for which he has been acting as marshal; and whether such indictments have been disposed of, and when, and in what way, and by whose direction they have been disposed of.

MRS. FASSETT'S ELECTORAL COMMISSION PAINTING.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of purchasing from Mrs. Fassett her painting of the Electoral Commission of 1877.

OHIO MUSTER-ROLLS.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the order of "concurrent and other resolutions" is closed, I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution that was read awhile ago and which is at the desk. It will take but a moment.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. Res. 210) requiring the Secretary of War to furnish copies of certain muster-rolls to the governor of the State of Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Ohio that there is a clerical omission of the word "the" before the word "governor" in the text of the joint resolution. It now reads "to governor of Ohio." If there be no objection the joint resolution will be amended so as to read: "to the governor of Ohio."

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the amendment except the delay that will result in sending it back to the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will not put the question on the amendment without the consent of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the phrase "to governor of Ohio" would operate just as well.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATCHEZ MARINE-HOSPITAL BUILDING.

Mr. GARLAND. In pursuance of the notice I gave a few moments ago, I should like to have the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2334) to release the American Baptist Home Mission Society from the conditions of the sale of the marine-hospital building and grounds at Natchez, Miss. I think it will take but a very few moments.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. GARLAND. The Committee on the Judiciary reported a bill exactly like this with the exception of a proviso. I will offer that proviso, which the Secretary holds in his hand, as an amendment to this bill to come in at the end of it, after the word "contained."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That by proper covenant, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, such society secures the appropriation of the proceeds of such sale to the construction of a school building at Jackson, Miss., to be used for the purpose of education for the benefit of the colored people.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND. I now move the indefinite postponement of Senate bill No. 833.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 833) to release the American Baptist Home Mission Society from the conditions of the sale of the marine-hospital building and grounds at Natchez, Miss., with a view to its indefinite postponement. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill for that purpose? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Arkansas moves that the bill be indefinitely postponed. That order will be entered, if there be no objection.

FLORIDA INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair now lays before the Senate the Calendar under the eighth rule, commencing at Order of Business 165, being the bill (S. 230) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to settle the claim of the State of Florida on account of expenditures made in suppressing Indian hostilities. This is the bill reported by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] which has been passed over by unanimous consent to await the return of the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES]. If there be no objection, it will be again passed over, retaining its place.

AMERICAN SHIPPING.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Order of Business 190 is next in order, being the bill (S. 1448) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes.

Mr. FRYE. If objection should be made to this bill and on motion it should be determined to consider it notwithstanding the objection, it would displace this Calendar for probably four or five mornings. I am very anxious to have this bill considered. It is of very great importance and it ought to be considered before a great while, and if passed by the Senate sent to the House of Representatives. I can not see any objection to making it a special order. There are now three special orders outside of the unfinished business. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] desires to speak to this bill, and I understand the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] also. My judgment is that the bill can be passed or rejected in one day, that it will not create a great deal of discussion, and I ask that it be made a special order for Friday next at 2 o'clock. I do this notwithstanding that there are already three special orders and with notice too from the Appropriations Committee that they propose to call up their naval bill. But it is very desirable that this bill shall be acted upon within the next ten days, and if it is made a special order for the time I have named, I think it can be. I ask that it be made a special order for Friday at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDNET pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until Friday next, April 4, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and that it be made the special order for that time. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine, which requires a two-third vote.

Mr. BAYARD. Will not next Friday be Good Friday? Because if it is I trust the Senate will not be in session on that day.

Mr. GARLAND. Friday week will be Good Friday.

Mr. FRYE. I simply desire to have the special order made. It is very doubtful about its coming up on Friday because there are two other special orders ahead of it.

Mr. BAYARD. I suggest that it be made for some other day when the Senate will certainly be in session.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to inquire of the Chair what is the parliamentary difference between the postponement of a matter which is before the Senate to a fixed hour and the making of it a special order at that hour? The reason of my inquiry is that the motion put by the Chair would require a two-third vote, whereas the postponement alone could be effected by a majority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule provides that special orders shall be made only on the vote of two-thirds of the Senate. The Chair thinks that, under the practice of the Senate and the previous interpretation of the rules, a motion to postpone to a particular day or a particular hour of a day can be carried by a majority.

Mr. HOAR. That I understand. When a measure is reached it has this advantage of its being within the power of the Senate to postpone it to any particular time by a bare majority, and that when it is postponed to that time it stands like any special order for that time. Of course it may lose its place by other special orders.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not so understand the rule. The Chair thinks that the postponement of a bill to a special hour or a special day without its being made a special order leaves it a general order for that time, and if there are any other general orders for that time preceding it undisposed of, they are entitled to be first considered. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BECK. If this motion carries does the bill lose its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII, where it now stands?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that if it be made a special order for any future time it will be taken out from the operation of Rule VIII and stand on the Calendar of Special Orders to be taken up under the rule applicable to special orders.

Mr. BECK. I submit that if it be made a special order with two special orders pending ahead of it, that means that it will be a good while in all probability before it will be reached as a special order. The naval appropriation bill comes up to-morrow or next day. That has been added to by $6,000,000; seven new steamships are to be built, and a great many other things will occupy the attention of the Senate a good while if the recommendations of the Senate Committee on Appropriations are considered. I think the Senator from Maine perhaps would do as well to move notwithstanding the objection to proceeding under the five-minute rule which I agree can not be done, to proceed now, and perhaps in a couple of mornings this bill can be disposed of. I agree that I want to be heard on it. I favor the report of the minority of the Committee on Commerce; and I expect to occupy about thirty minutes in presenting my views favoring the minority report. I do not know how many others desire to speak; but of course the members of the committee will speak. I believe the only way to get a hearing for this bill within a reasonable time is to move its consideration now notwithstanding the objection. It will not be reached for a very long time as a special order with so many bills ahead of it and with a naval appropriation bill which beyond all question is going to be a very long one and involve a great many debatable questions.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Maine will not move to proceed with the consideration of this bill at this time or during the morning hour. The morning hour was not intended for the consideration of bills of this character, but was intended for the consideration of bills to which there is really but little, if any, objection. There are a great many bills of that character on the Calendar, many of which have been reported from the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, and the only chance there is for the consideration of those bills is to devote the morning hour to them as it was intended to be devoted to their consideration when the present rules were adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to submit to the Senator from Maine a proposition. It will be difficult to discuss so important a bill as the one he desires to take up in the morning hour. As I understand the motion of the Senator from Maine, it is to take up the bill in the morning hour.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. No, to make it the special order for next Friday.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The proposition of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] then is to take it up in the morning hour and discuss it under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BECK. No, to take it out of the five-minute rule.

Mr. MCPHERSON. That will have to be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. BECK. No, Rule VIII provides that when objection is made, then a motion can be made to proceed notwithstanding the objection, and if a majority agree to that the bill goes on with unlimited debate.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The only objection I had was the difficulty of discussing a bill of so much importance under the five-minute rule. If there is no limit to debate I have no objection.

Mr. FRYE. My anxiety is for the bill, and at the same time to accommodate Senators. This bill certainly, if taken up in the morning hour, will displace everything else on this Calendar for three or four days and perhaps for a week. I do not like to do that. I would rather take my chance to get it as a special order on Friday or Saturday, hoping that the bankruptcy bill, or the naval bill, or the bill to regulate practice in patent suits will be out of the way by that time. If they are not, if the majority of the Senate after this is made a special order determine on motion that they will proceed to consider this bill, they can do it. It is in the control of a majority of the Senate after it is made a special order, and can be taken up on Friday if the Senate says so if an appropriation bill is not in the way. I hope it will be made a special order for Friday and take its chance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until Friday next at 2 o'clock and that it be made the special order for that time.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 32, noes 3, no quorum voting.

Several SENATORS. Take the vote again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question again and Senators will please vote on one side or the other.

The question being again put, the motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 38, noes 6.

REMOVAL OF CONGRESSIONAL EMPLOYÉS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The next order of business on the Calendar is No. 192, being the concurrent resolution of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER] providing for the appointment of a joint committee to inquire into and report the cause of all removals of subordinate officers of the Senate and House of Representatives, &c.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I suggest that that go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered if there be no objection.

BILLS OBJECTED TO.

The bill (S. 660) to carry into effect the recommendation of the board of admirals convened under the joint resolution approved February 5, 1879, in the case of Commander James H. Sands, United States Navy, was announced as next in order.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I object to the consideration of that bill under this rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over.

Mr. McPHERSON. I should like to have the bill go over without any prejudice.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I can not consent to that. I have objections to this bill, and it can not be considered under this rule even if the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] who reported it were present.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator from Florida has all the papers in the case; he has submitted the report; and he will be here probably to-morrow. An objection would place the bill, I suppose, at the foot of the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. No; on the other Calendar.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. It must necessarily go to that Calendar, for I shall object to its being considered under the five-minute rule. It is an important bill, and has been before Congress for years.

Mr. McPHERSON. I suppose the Senator will be ready to consider it when the Senator from Florida is here.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I shall not be ready to consider it under Rule VIII. It must go on the other Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is objected to, and goes over.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. The next two bills on the Calendar being the bill (S. 601) to carry into effect the recommendation of the board of admirals convened under the joint resolution approved February 5, 1879, in the case of Lieut. Commander Charles D. Sigsbee, United States Navy, and the bill (S. 662) to carry into effect the recommendation of the board of admirals convened under the joint resolution approved February 5, 1879, in the case of Commander Henry Glass, United States Navy, are of a similar character, and I make the same objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills will be passed over.

DISTRICT CHARITABLE CORPORATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1063) to amend the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert—

That the following sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States of America relating to the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, amended in the following manner, that is to say:

Section 545, by striking out the words "not exceeding twenty years;" so that the same shall read:

"SEC. 545. Any three or more persons of full age, citizens of the United States, a majority of whom shall be citizens of the District, who desire to associate themselves for benevolent, charitable, educational, literary, musical, scientific, religious, or missionary purposes, including societies formed for mutual improvement or for the promotion of the arts, may make, sign, and acknowledge, before any officer authorized to take acknowledgment of deeds in the District, and file in the office of the recorder of deeds, to be recorded by him, a certificate in writing in which shall be stated—

"First. The name or title by which such society shall be known in law.

"Second. The term for which it is organized.

"Third. The particular business and objects of the society.

"Fourth. The number of its trustees, directors, or managers for the first year of its existence."

Section 546, by adding at the end thereof the words "and other real and personal property the clear annual income from which shall not exceed in value $25,000;" so that the same shall read:

"SEC. 546. Upon filing their certificates the persons who shall have signed and acknowledged the same, and their associates and successors, shall be a body politic and corporate, by the name stated in such certificate; and by that name they and their successors may have and use a common seal, and may alter and change the same at pleasure, and may make by-laws and elect officers and agents, and may take, receive, hold, and convey real and personal estate necessary for the purposes of the society as stated in their certificate, and other real and personal property the clear annual income from which shall not exceed in value $25,000: Provided, however, That this section shall not be construed to exempt any property from taxation in addition to that now specifically exempted by law."

Section 547, by striking out the words "annually, or oftener, elect from its members," and inserting the word "elect" after the word "may," in the first line; so that the same shall read:

"SEC. 547. Such incorporated society may elect its trustees, directors, or managers at such time and place and in such manner as may be specified in its by-laws, who shall have the control and management of the affairs and funds of the society, and a majority of whom shall be a quorum for the transaction of business; and whenever any vacancy shall happen in such board of trustees, directors, or managers, the vacancy shall be filled in such manner as shall be provided by the by-laws of the society."

That section 549 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia be, and the same hereby is, repealed; and in lieu of said section the following is enacted:

"SEC. 459. Any property of the corporation may be leased, encumbered by mortgage or deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage, or sold and conveyed absolutely, when authorized by a vote of a majority of the shares of stock of the corporation, or by a vote of a majority of the directors, managers, or trustees of the corporation, at a meeting called for the purpose, and the proceedings of which meeting shall be duly entered in the records of the corporation; and the proceeds arising therefrom shall be applied or invested for the use and benefit of such corporation."

SEC. 2. That section 551 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 3. That any corporation heretofore formed under sections 545 to 552, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia may avail itself of the provisions of this act by complying with its requirements, and those that this act is intended to amend; but the right to repeal this act, and to alter, amend, or abolish any charter of incorporation granted under it, is expressly reserved to Congress.

Mr. McMILLAN. I should like to hear from the Senator from Tennessee, who reported this bill, an explanation of it.

Mr. HARRIS. There is a printed report, which is very brief, and quite as brief as any explanation I can make. I simply ask that the Secretary will read the report.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope that it will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, February 11, 1884:

The sections of the Revised Statutes proposed to be amended by this bill provide the method by which societies for benevolent, charitable, educational, literary, musical, scientific, religious, or missionary purposes, including societies for mutual improvement or the promotion of the arts, may be incorporated without special acts of incorporation.

The only change sought to be made in section 545 is to strike out the limitation of "twenty years" as the life of such corporations, leaving them to fix the term for themselves, subject only to the reserved right of Congress to alter, amend, or abolish such charters of incorporation.

Section 546 limits the right of such corporations to take, receive, hold, and convey real and personal property to such as may be necessary to the purposes of such society, as stated in their certificate of incorporation.

As this limitation may be construed to limit the right to hold property other than such as may be necessary for the offices of such society, property as a source of income, to be used for the purposes of such corporations, the committee recommend that it be so modified as to authorize such corporations to hold property the annual profits or income from which shall not exceed $25,000, which shall be devoted to the certified purposes of such corporation; but this act not to be construed as exempting any property from taxation not already exempted by the laws now in force.

Section 547 provides that such corporations "may annually, or oftener, elect from its members its trustees, directors, or managers." The bill proposes to leave such corporations free to regulate by their by-laws the time and manner of effecting their trustees, directors, or managers, and does not restrict them to their members only.

Section 549 provides that such corporations may, by a vote of two-thirds of the shares of stock in such corporation, sell and dispose of any real estate acquired by it when such lot or building shall become ineligible for the uses for which they were intended.

The committee recommends the repeal of this section, and in lieu of it a provision authorizing such corporation, upon a vote of a majority of the shares of stock, or a majority of the trustees, directors, or managers, to lease, mortgage, or sell and convey any property of such corporation, the proceeds to be applied or invested to the use and benefit of such corporation.

Section 551 requires that no corporation acting under sections 545 to 550, inclusive, "shall hold real estate more than five years, except so much as shall be necessary for the purposes named in its certificate."

The committee recommends the repeal of this section, believing that such corporations should not be compelled to dispose of property at a sacrifice which may be or may have been devised or given for charities such as these.

The committee submits with this report a letter from Mr. Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court of the United States, and one from Samuel V. Niles, esq., president of the Children's Hospital, with the suggestions of which the committee fully concurs, and therefore report the bill back with amendments, and recommend that it pass.

[Re Senate Bill 1063.]

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, February 5, 1884.

DEAR SIR: As president of the Garfield Memorial Hospital, organized under the general law of the District of Columbia, my attention has been called to serious defects in that law.

These were perhaps of no great consequence when special charters could easily have been obtained from Congress, and when occasions for such charters were few, but with the growth of the District in wealth, in culture, and in population, much of which needs charitable and benevolent organizations, the restricted and limited character of the powers conferred by the general law needs reconsideration.

A very well considered bill, introduced by yourself January 14, is before your committee, and I hope it will be pressed to a speedy passage.

No such corporation, for instance, can expect to become permanently useful whose existence is limited to twenty years.

And the limitation as to the amount of property, real or personal, to be held by such an institution is an effectual barrier to the establishment of any great hospital or library, or other useful public corporation.

We have nearly completed a hospital with seven acres of ground. We have another lot in the city covered with buildings which, by the present law, we must sell within three years from this time, whether we get a good price or not, thus placing us at the mercy of any one desiring to purchase.

However these restrictions may have been appropriate at the time of their enactment, the times and the city of Washington have outgrown them, and I beg leave to solicit your earnest attention and that of your committee to the necessity of the amendments embodied in the bill.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

SAM. F. MILLER.

Hon. J. J. INGALLS,
Chairman Senate Committee on District of Columbia.

---

CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL, Washington, January 11, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I am instructed by the board of directors of the Children's Hospital to request you to introduce the inclosed bill in the Senate.

This hospital was organized in 1870 under the act of Congress of May, 1870 (United States Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, sections 545 to 552).

This act limits the existence of corporations created under it to twenty years; does not authorize such a corporation to mortgage any of its property, even though it be necessary for the advancement of the object for which it was organized; does not authorize it to hold real estate more than five years, except such as is in actual use of the corporation; does not authorize it to sell its real estate unless it surrenders its charter, except the lot in actual use, in which case the proceeds must be invested in the purchase of another lot to be used for the same purpose; and requires the election of trustees to be held every year, instead of in classes of one, two, and three or more years. The object of this bill is to remove these obstacles.

The Children's Hospital is particularly anxious to have the amendment passed, because several years ago Dr. J. C. Hall left it several pieces of unimproved real estate, which yield no income, but are a burden to the hospital by the annual payment of taxes.

Hoping that you will comply with the request of the directors, and will also give the matter your favorable attention when it comes before your committee (District of Columbia), and before the Senate, I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

SAMUEL V. NILES,
President Children's Hospital

Hon. JOHN J. INGALLS,
United States Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read:

A bill to amend the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

THE JEANNETTE EXPEDITION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1039) for the relief of the survivors of the exploring steamer Jeannette, and the widows and children of those who perished in the retreat from the wreck of that vessel in the Arctic seas.

The preamble recites that the steamer Jeannette, while engaged in an exploring expedition by authority of Congress and under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, was wrecked in the Arctic seas, on the 13th of June, 1881, and in consequence thereof the lives of many of her officers and crew were lost; and that a court of inquiry, appointed in pursuance of a joint resolution of Congress to investigate the circumstances attending the loss of the Jeannette and the general conduct and merits of all the officers and enlisted men of the expedition, reported, after a thorough investigation, that while every officer and man so conducted himself that there was no occasion to impute censure to any member of the expedition, the constancy and endurance with which they met the hardships and dangers that beset them entitle them to great praise.

Therefore the bill to reimburse the survivors of the officers and crew of the Jeannette for losses incurred by them, respectively, in consequence of the wreck of that vessel, proposes to pay to George W. Melville, chief engineer, one thousand dollars; to John W. Danenhower, lieutenant, one thousand dollars; to Raymond L. Newcomb, naturalist and taxidermist, six hundred dollars; to John Cole, acting boatswain, six hundred dollars; to W. F. C. Nindemann, seaman, six hundred dollars; to James H. Bartlett, fireman, six hundred dollars; and to the remaining survivors of the crew, namely, Louis P. Noros, Herbert W. Leach, Henry Wilson, Frank E. Manson, Charles Tong Sing, seamen, and John Lauterbach, coal-heaver, three hundred dollars each.

The second section declares that the 23d of March, 1882, being the date of finding the remains of the commanding officer and others of the expedition, shall be deemed and taken to be the date of the decease of the following-named officers and enlisted men of the expedition who lost their lives in the retreat from the wreck of the Jeannette: Lieut. Commander George W. De Long; Lieut. Charles W. Chipp; Passed Asst. Surg. James M. Ambler; Jerome J. Collins, meteorologist; William Dunbar, ice-pilot; Walter Lee, machinist; Henrich H. Kaack, Carl A. Gortz, Adolph Dressler, Hans H. Erichsen, Ah Sam, Alfred Sweetman, Henry D. Warren, Peter E. Johnson, Edward Star, and Albert G. Kuehne, seamen; Nelse Iverson, George W. Boyd, and Walter Sharvell, coal-heavers, and Seaman Alexy.

The third section directs the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow to the widow of any deceased officer or enlisted man named in the second section, or if there be no widow living, to the lawful child or children of such deceased, or if there be no widow or child living, to the surviving parent or parents of such deceased, or if there be no widow, child, or parent living, to the brothers and sisters of the deceased, if any, a sum equal to twelve months' pay, according to the rate of pay at which the name of such deceased was borne upon the pay-rolls of the steamer Jeannette. The legal representatives of the deceased officers and enlisted men named in the second section are also to be paid from the Treasury any arrears of pay due such deceased, the same to be computed up to and including the 23d of March, 1882. The relatives, in the order herein named, of Seaman Aniguin, one of the crew of the steamer Jeannette, and who, while connected with the expedition, died at Irkutsk, Siberia, January 5, 1883, are in like manner to be entitled to receive twelve months' pay in addition to the amount due the deceased at the time of his death.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a preamble. The question is on agreeing to the preamble.

The preamble was agreed to.

WILLIAM H. CROOK.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 458) for the relief of William H. Crook.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 6, before the word "thousand," to strike out "six" and insert "four;" so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to William H. Crook, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,000, as compensation for services as secretary to the President to sign land patents for the fiscal years of 1879, 1880, 1881, and 1882, inclusive, and which services were additional to his regular duties as executive clerk and disbursing agent, the amount being the same as was formerly paid for such service.

Mr. PLUMB. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a report.

Mr. PLUMB. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, February 11, 1884:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 458) for the relief of William H. Crook, report as follows:

By the act of July 4, 1836 (R. S., sec. 450), Congress authorized the President to appoint a secretary with the title of "Secretary to the President to sign land patents," at a salary of $1,500 per annum. This officer was continued down to 1878, having no other duty imposed upon him except to sign, in the President's name, the patents issued by the Government on the sales and grants of public lands. Under the act above cited this officer, although in name a secretary to the President, was, in fact, and was recognized by the law, as an officer of the Land Department, and during the greater part at least of the period above stated he occupied a room and desk in the General Land Office, having no duties to perform and no place at the Executive Mansion.

By act of June 20, 1878 (20 Stat., p. 183), the appropriation for payment of the salary of this officer was omitted, and the President was directed to designate one of his executive clerks to perform the duty of signing land patents.

Mr. William H. Crook was then, and had been since 1871, an executive clerk, acting as disbursing officer of the Executive Mansion, and also in charge of the reception-room. All of these duties he has continued to perform down to the present time. In addition to them, he was designated by the President, July 1, 1878, as secretary to sign land patents, and since that time all the patents issued on sales and grants of public lands have passed under his hand.

The number of patents issued since July 1, 1878, has averaged about 40,000 each year, and has steadily increased. The labor of the secretary in executing same has been very onerous, each patent having two signatures attached, and all having to be checked off and accounted for. On account of his regular duties at the Executive Mansion Mr. Crook has been compelled to perform most of this extra work of signing patents out of office hours; but, notwithstanding this fact, we are assured that the work has been done more promptly and efficiently than when an officer was charged with the performance of this duty alone. In fact Mr. Crook has, in addition to the other duties of his position, since July 1, 1878, performed, without compensation in any form, labor for which from 1836 to 1878 the Government paid $1,500 per annum.

We attach hereto, as exhibits, letters from Hon. J. A. Williamson, late Commissioner of the General Land Office, and Hon. W. K. Rogers, private secretary to President Hayes, both of whom, from their official positions, were familiar with the labor performed by Mr. Crook and the time and manner of its execution.

It seems to your committee that he is in justice and equity entitled to a fair compensation.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill be passed with the following amendment, namely: In line 6 strike out the word "six" and insert in lieu thereof the word "four."

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 30, 1881.

SIR: Your note of this date is at hand. I fully agree with you that you should have extra compensation for signing land patents. Before this additional duty was assigned to you the President's secretary to sign land patents was allowed $1,500 a year for that service, and I think the service was worth the amount. The responsibility of the position, in addition to the clerical labor, is very considerable, and should be paid for. I think you are fully entitled to extra compensation, and sincerely hope that it may be given you.

Very sincerely, yours,

J. A. WILLIAMSON.

Col. W. H. CROOK,
Executive Mansion, City.

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 18, 1881.

DEAR SIR: I entirely agree with you that you should receive extra compensation for signing land patents. During the four years while I was private secretary to the President your regular duties as executive clerk and disbursing officer were sufficient to keep you employed all the time during office hours. The additional service you rendered in signing land patents was necessarily performed out of office hours, the greater part of it night-work. Upon the omission by Congress (the act of June 30, 1878) of the usual provision for the salary of the secretary of the President to sign land patents, and the requirement that the President should designate one of the executive clerks to discharge the duties of the office, you were selected by President Hayes because of your familiarity with the work, having temporarily filled the position during the illness of the secretary appointed for the purpose by President Grant. It is a laborious and responsible position, and the work was carefully, diligently, and faithfully performed. I earnestly trust Congress will allow you full compensation for the service rendered.

Very truly, yours,

W. K. ROGERS.

W. H. CROOK,
Executive Clerk to the President.

Mr. HARRISON. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee who reported this bill what salary this clerk was receiving? This bill seems to go on the idea that when an additional function or duty is devolved upon a public officer he is to have extra pay for it, and the report does not inform us what pay he was receiving for the work he was already doing.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. My impression is—but I am not exactly certain about it—that he was a sixteen-hundred-dollar clerk.

Mr. HARRISON. And this bill proposes to make his salary about how much annually?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Twenty-six hundred dollars—to add $1,000 a year to it.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not believe the bill is right; I do not think it ought to be done. Whatever may be done prospectively with reference to the salary of an officer, I do not think it right to make it retroactive, and where simply an additional function has been devolved upon him to pay him back pay. If this rule is established we may carry it through all the Departments and heads of Departments.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Committee on Claims has had a great many bills referred to it proposing an increase of salary to officers and clerks for preceding years. All those bills that have been reported from the committee have been reported adversely except this bill. The committee thought this case clearly an exceptional case.

If the Senator from Indiana had observed the reading of the report he would have noticed that from 1836 until 1878 there was a secretary to the President for signing land patents. This secretary received a salary of $1,500 a year. He had no duties to perform except the duties in connection with the signing of land patents. In 1878 the appropriation that had been made for more than thirty years annually prior to that time for the payment of this secretary was omitted, and the President was directed to designate one of the executive clerks for the purpose of performing that duty. He designated Mr. Crook. Mr. Crook at that time had charge of the reception-room at the Executive Mansion and had charge of the expenditures at the Executive Mansion. Those duties required his attention during the day. During the evening and night he devoted his time to the signing of land patents. He took the patents home with him, and frequently, as we are informed, worked late at night in signing those patents and making the necessary entries on the books. He performed this duty for four years. Last year a provision was inserted in one of the appropriation bills giving the Executive Mansion an additional clerk. Since that time Mr. Crook has continued to perform the duties connected with the signing of land patents, but some of the other duties that prior to that time had been imposed upon him have been taken off his shoulders; so that this bill does not provide that any compensation shall be made to Mr. Crook for signing patents during the last year, but for the four years prior to that time.

The Committee on Claims fully recognize the fact that when the compensation of an officer has been fixed and his duties prescribed by law or by custom he has no right to come to Congress and ask for additional compensation; and as I have already stated, that committee have never reported in favor of a bill of this character except this one bill; and it was in the opinion of the committee so clearly outside of the ordinary run of claims of that kind, that they felt constrained, notwithstanding the rule they had adopted, to report in favor of it.

Mr. GARLAND. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin—I did not catch the reading of the report very clearly—if this is an appropriation for this particular case as an exception to section 1764 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It is.

Mr. GARLAND. Did the committee find that the $1,500 he was allowed for his regular pay was not sufficient to meet this new labor imposed on him?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That was the opinion of the committee, because the duties that were imposed upon him as executive clerk at the Executive Mansion were sufficient to occupy his entire time during the day, and he performed the duties connected with the signing of land patents outside of office hours. There is no doubt about the fact.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not desire to argue the bill, but merely to place on record the fact that I dissented from the majority of the committee in the reporting of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I rise to correct some little inaccuracies in the statement of my good friend from Wisconsin, who is generally so accurate in his statement of these matters. As stated in this report, under the act of 1836, which I will now read and which is section 450 of the Revised Statutes, it is provided that—

> The President is authorized to appoint, from time to time, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a secretary, at a salary of $1,500 a year, whose duty it shall be, under the direction of the President, to sign in his name, and for him, all patents for land sold or granted under the authority of the United States.

In 1878 Congress passed this law (volume 20 of the Statutes, page 183):

> For compensation to the following in the office of the President of the United States: Private secretary, $3,250; assistant secretary, $2,250; two executive clerks, at $2,000 each; stenographer, $1,800; steward, at $1,800; and messenger and usher, at $1,200; in all, $14,300. And the duties prescribed by section of the Revised Statutes numbered 450—> shall devolve upon and be discharged by one of the executive clerks, to be designated by the President for that purpose.

Being the one I have just read—

And who received, instead of $1,000, $2,000 a year, and this statute expressly devolved upon one of those clerks the performance of this special duty, and practically abolished the other secretary and gave this clerk $2,000 for the performance of the duty; so that this is a gratuity pure and simple of $1,000 a year extra, running his salary up to $3,000 and within $250 of the salary of the private secretary.

Mr. CONGER. That does not quite express the situation here. The officer who had signed the patents before had been detailed from the Land Office, performed for years and years this duty, and was paid for it at the rate of $1,500 a year I think, or $1,600.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Fifteen hundred dollars.

Mr. CONGER. Fifteen hundred dollars. Under this provision there was no allowance for an additional officer at the Executive Mansion to perform this duty. The Government had paid $1,500 a year continually for the performance of the duty ever since it had been performed by a special clerk. Now, if it had made another office and paid another officer at the Executive Mansion to perform the duties there, the argumennt would be correct that there should be no more paid. But it made no new officer, it provided no extra pay for the performance of a duty for which a clerk had been detailed from the Land Office for years before; it simply threw upon some one there, somebody in whom the President had confidence in his judgment and accuracy, the authority to sign the President's name to all that great mass of patents which the President was required to sign. The President selected among those persons in his office Colonel Crook to perform this duty, and he the officer in charge of the Executive Mansion, with all the duties pertaining to it, which had always before required the entire time and attention of an officer. Colonel Crook assumed the duty with the full knowledge that it was to be performed in addition to the full duties which he had been performing before and would perform thereafter, and as he has informed me, and as the proof shows, the entire performance of this duty was after the business hours for the performance of his regular duties at the Executive Mansion, and occupied, as I am informed, in the press of business his time till 1, 2, and 3 o'clock at night before it was finished.

It was the understanding both of the President and of the officer who rendered this service that Congress, as soon as it was understood, would make an appropriation to meet the additional labor and additional expense. The service has been performed for the years mentioned here continuously out of office hours, and I agree with the chairman of the committee—for I was a member of the committee at the last session when this case was examined—that the service was rendered, requiring in good faith an additional payment, and I think the amount fixed here for that payment is reasonable. Congress itself afterward provided an additional clerk to perform these duties with an additional salary, and that is being done now. It always had been done before up to the time when this account is charged for; it has been done by an additional officer since. Senators must be aware of the responsibility of a man who is to perform that delicate duty of signing the President's name to the evidences of title to our lands. It should be in the hands of some one that the President has confidence in; and it has been done in that way.

I have examined the subject very fully, and while I am as unwilling as any Senator here to vote additional payment to an officer on almost any pretense who had accepted his place and had performed its duties on a given salary, yet when, as in this case, an additional amount of labor, as I am positive from the inquiries I made when a member of this committee of officers of the Land Office and of the officers in charge of the Executive Mansion, was imposed involving almost full night labor upon this officer and it was faithfully and well performed, I am willing to make an equitable allowance for that service.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan if he knows the compensation received by this clerk outside of the extra compensation now proposed?

Mr. CONGER. I think it was $1,600 a year. I think that was the compensation he received.

Mr. ALLISON. The law says $2,000.

Mr. CONGER. That is at present, but at the time this duty was performed—I will not be positive, but I think the salary was $1,600.

Mr. ALLISON. He received $2,000 per annum for all this period.

Mr. CONGER. I may be mistaken about it.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no question about that. There is the statute that put the duty on him, and that put his salary at $2,000.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I supposed it was $1,600, but it appears to have been $2,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. CONGER. Of course I am not certain about the amount; but up to the time when Mr. Crook assumed the performance of these duties a clerk was paid to perform them, as I understand detailed from the Land Office, and he had been paid for attending to them for thirty years. By throwing them on Mr. Crook additional duties to a large amount, employing night labor continuously, were imposed upon this officer. The service was undoubtedly rendered extra from any other service which he could have been called upon to perform, and he did it because the President desired him to perform it and he desired to comply with the wishes of the President. There was a sort of confidential relation in it.

There is no question but what if this officer had allowed himself to perform these duties during the ordinary business hours of the day it would have involved a running behind all the way, and those who were anxious for their patents must have felt the inconvenience of it. The public good was subserved by the extra performance of this duty, and I see no reason why there should be any delicacy in making an appropriation for it that is certainly limited compared with what has been paid before and limited compared with what is being paid now for the same service that Colonel Crook performed with a fidelity and business energy which commanded my admiration when I found out what had been done. There is no reason why he should not receive a compensation which he has justly earned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL. In view of the fact that this recommendation of $4,000 was based upon the idea that he was receiving $1,600 a year and it was the intention to make his whole pay $2,600, I move to strike out $4,000 and insert $2,400. That will give $600 extra and make his pay $2,600 a year, the amount the committee determined he should be entitled to.

Mr. CONGER. That motion is based upon the uncertain recollection, the uncertain memory, which I had in making my statement. If the Senator from Missouri desires to have his private thrust at me, some time when we can carry it out in our own way I shall accept the proposition with a kind of subdued pleasure; but that he should make the occasion of even a misstatement of mine the opportunity of doing wrong to another is not in accordance with his usually generous, manly nature. I know he would not do wrong to a citizen because he wanted to make a thrust at me. I think the chairman of the committee made the same mistake that I did. The point of what has been received was not the material point. The point was whether in addition to the duties for which he was receiving a given salary he had devoted himself with untiring energy for the interest of those who were anxious to have their patents and to have this work kept up to this extra work. Senators all, without any particular reference to it, know that under the homestead law and the vast increase of settlements in the West, the number of land patents issued has been increasing continually year by year, and was especially large during this period. But I presume my friend from Missouri now having made the proposition will withdraw it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why, Mr. President, there is no Senator in the world that I would take more pleasure in accommodating than the distinguished Senator from Michigan; but the whole committee was acting on this, and I am simply bringing this bill down to the understanding of the committee.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the committee meant to pay this man for his night-work. He had a duty imposed upon him, and if at the end of the fair, decent, honest business hours he had stopped and said, "I shall not work any more to-day," he would have drawn his salary, and nobody could have found fault with him, and if the patents had been delayed and piled up and accumulated in the office the investigation would have disclosed simply that Congress had pinched a little too closely. The committee found that this man, instead of going home, as he had a right to do, at sundown, sat there to accommodate these patentees who were entitled to their lands into the night until 1, 2, and 3 o'clock in the morning, and did this mass of work. Of course $1,000 is a round number; if the Senate thinks $2,500, instead of $4,000, would be a reasonable and proper sum, that is another thing, but the mere fact that the chairman stated——

Mr. ALLISON. Do I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to say that the committee had evidence before it that this gentleman worked every night during these three years to 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning signing patents?

Mr. HOAR. I did not say so.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the basis of this claim.

Mr. HOAR. They had evidence of the extent of his night-work which was understood and reported by the chairman or whoever investigated the case. I do not undertake to affirm that every night he was up till 3 o'clock.

Mr. HARRISON. Can the Senator tell about what the average number of patents signed per day was?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If that bill can be temporarily laid aside informally until action can be had on the Crook bill I shall be much obliged.

Mr. ALLISON. Will not this bill come up to-morrow morning?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. BLAIR. How much time does the Senator think it will take?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Five minutes, I think, will do.

Mr. BLAIR. I will consent for five minutes.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Say ten.

Mr. BLAIR. Very well, ten.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin asks that the Crook bill be further considered.

Mr. BLAIR. Not exceeding ten minutes.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it stand over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. I object. I can not give unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is objection.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Allow me to state that it appeared from the evidence before the committee that the number of patents signed by this clerk during each year exceeded 40,000, and he is required to sign each patent twice. He was required to receipt for all the patents received by him and to take a receipt for all patents delivered by him. He was required to keep a regular book in which the number of the patent was entered, and on which it appeared that that patent had been delivered to the person authorized to receive it from him; so that his duties were really very onerous.

Mr. CONGER. Will this bill come up under the same rule to-morrow morning?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will come up at first under Rule VIII.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 28th ultimo, approved and signed the act (S. 1847) to authorize the issuing of a register to John S. McQuin and J. Warren Wonson for the schooner Druid.

The message also announced that the President had, on the 31st ultimo, approved and signed the following act and joint resolution:

An act (S. 1692) to limit the cost of indexing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; and Joint resolution (S. R. 64) providing for the addition of $10,000 to the contingent fund of the Senate.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. PLUMB to recommit the bill to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I said all that I cared to say on this bill early in the debate and shall be as brief as I can now in fortifying arguments then made. I would not have said anything further had not the debate taken a wide range and the position assumed by me in the argument heretofore made been assailed with a good deal of vigor and plausibility.

I am opposed to this bill. I am opposed to it on constitutional grounds and I am opposed to it on grounds of policy and expediency. I do not believe that Congress has the constitutional power to pass the bill, and if Congress does possess the power I believe it would be unwise and inexpedient to exercise it.

This bill appropriates $105,000,000, to be expended over a period of ten years in the partial support of common schools in the several States of the Union. The money to be expended is to be raised by taxation upon the people of the United States. I do not believe that the common schools of the several States and their partial or their total maintenance is a subject within the jurisdiction or power of the Congress of the United States, and I do not believe that the Congress of the United States has the power to tax the people of the United States in order to raise revenue to expend upon a subject not within the jurisdiction of Congress. I believe, Mr. President, that the great power of taxation can be invoked only for the purpose of raising revenue to carry out and execute the powers of Congress. I do not believe that that great power can be invoked for the purpose of raising money to be expended on an object outside of the jurisdiction of Congress.

Therefore, Mr. President, I do say that when gentlemen establish the power of Congress to pass this bill, to tax the people and appropriate this money, with the establishment of that power they establish the jurisdiction and the power of Congress over the common schools of the States. If Congress has jurisdiction over the common-school systems of the States, then Congress can tax the people and raise the money and expend it in the maintenance of those schools; but if the illiterates of this country are subject only to State control, if the common schools of this country pertain only to the jurisdiction of the States, if Congress has no power to control and manage them, then I think as a logical consequence that Congress has no power to make appropriations for their support and to tax the people for that purpose.

Gentlemen who desire this appropriation for the support of common schools in the States must take it cum onere. They can not claim it as a gift; they can not say that Congress has the power to tax the people to give money to the States for the school system and has no power to follow it and see to its administration and its disbursement. They can not say that, because Congress has not the power to call on the people of this country to contribute of their means for any other purpose than for revenue. Revenue for what? Revenue to be expended within the constitutional jurisdiction of Congress.

My friend from Mississippi who spoke last and sits nearest to me [Mr. GEORGE] says I must prove that proposition. I can prove it. I will prove it to the satisfaction of any impartial gentleman whose judgment is not obscured by an inordinate desire for a big appropriation.

Now I invite the Senate to the consideration of some authorities I will read upon this subject. They are brief; they will take but little time. I do not intend to detain the Senate long, and I ask the attention of the Senators while I am on the floor.

I hold in my hand Cooley on Taxation. Its author, Judge Cooley, is a constitutional lawyer of national reputation, and his law works are books of standard authority in our courts. Judge Cooley defines taxes:

Taxes are defined—

Says this author—

as being the enforced proportional contribution of persons and property levied by the authority of the state for the support of the government and for all public needs.

Not to enable the Government to make gifts, as the Senator from Mississippi claims.

That is Judge Cooley's definition of taxation. Again he says:

They are the property of the citizen, demanded and received by the government to be disposed of to enable it to carry into effect its mandates and to discharge its manifold functions.

Not to distribute as gifts on subjects outside of its jurisdiction. Again says the author:

The power of taxation is an incident of sovereignty, and is coextensive with that of which it is an incident. All subjects, therefore, over which the sovereign power of the state extends are, in its discretion, legitimate subjects of taxation; and this may be carried to any extent to which the government may choose to carry it.

Again, after enumerating a number of maxims on this subject, the author says:

All these maxims assume that taxation is laid for the purpose of obtaining a revenue. Within the definitions given, the burden would not be taxation if revenue were not the purpose.

Yet my friend from Mississippi says that the people can be indefinitely taxed, not for the revenue, but to make gifts and presents to others beyond the jurisdiction of the Government.

But again says the author:

All definitions of taxation imply that it is to be imposed only for public purposes, and whatever difference of opinion may exist regarding the admissibility of taxation in particular cases, the fundamental requirement that the purpose shall be public will be conceded on all sides.

What is a public purpose but a purpose of the Government which lays the tax to do a thing within its jurisdictional power?

But again, and here I ask the special attention of the Senate, because what I now read covers the whole question—the legality of the purpose of any particular tax, a question of first importance must always concern the grade of the government which assumes to levy it. The "public" that is concerned in a legal sense in any matter of government is the public the particular government has been provided for; and the "public purpose" for which that government may tax is one which concerns its own people, and not some other people having a government of its own, for whose wants taxes are laid. There may, therefore, be a public purpose as regards the Federal Union which would not be such as a basis for State taxation, and there may be a public purpose which would uphold State taxation but not the taxation which its municipalities would be at liberty to vote and collect. The purpose must in every instance pertain to the sovereignty with which the tax originates; it must be something within its jurisdiction so as to justify its making provision for it. The rule is applicable to all the subordinate municipalities; they are clothed with powers to accomplish certain objects, and for those objects they may tax, but not for others, however interesting or important, which are the proper concern of any other government or jurisdiction. State expenses are not to be provided for by Federal taxation, nor Federal expenses by State taxation, because in neither case would the taxation be levied by the government upon whose public the burden of the expenses properly rests. To provide for such expenses would consequently not be a purpose in which the people taxed would in a legal sense be concerned.

In considering—

Here is an authority which establishes in all its length and breadth the very proposition which I announced in the first speech I made on this bill and which my friend from Mississippi so vigorously controverted. He says that the Government of the United States may tax the people for a public purpose not of the United States but of the several States. Judge Cooley says that the public purpose for which a tax may be levied must be a purpose of the government levying the tax and within its jurisdiction to provide for.

I deny that the common schools of these United States are within the jurisdiction of the Congress or the Government of the United States. I deny that proposition. I say that they are within the jurisdiction of the governments of the States, that they are hedged about and encircled by the reserved rights of the States. I deny that the Government of the United States can enter that circle and take charge of those things embraced in it, or that the Government of the United States has the power to impose taxes upon the people for the purpose of going outside of its own jurisdiction into the jurisdiction of the States and expending the money so raised.

The Senator from Mississippi says the Government of the United States has no jurisdiction over the schools in the States, yet he advocates this bill, which appropriates $105,000,000 to be drawn by taxation from the people, to be expended on schools in the States, when Congress, by all the authorities, has no power to tax the people except for a public purpose within its own jurisdiction. The Senator's position is inconsistent and illogical.

The Senator from Mississippi demanded of me to establish the position that the Government of the United States have no right to tax the people of the United States in order to raise money to make gifts to the States. I think I have done this, but will go further. The honorable Senator from Mississippi plants himself upon the doctrine of Mr. Monroe. Mr. Monroe announced the doctrine that is now set up as the true doctrine, while the Senator believes that the Madison doctrine originally was right. What does Mr. Monroe say on this subject? I have here an extract from Mr. Monroe's writings read in a former but recent debate by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] from which I will read.

Mr. Monroe says:

Have Congress a right to raise and appropr te the public money to any and to every purpose according to their will and pleasure? They certainly have not. The Government of the United States is a limited government, instituted for great national purposes, and for those only.

"For great national," not State, "purposes." Again:

It is believed that there is not a corporation in the Union which does not exercise great discretion in the application of the money raised by it to the purposes of its institution. It would be strange if the Government of the United States, which was instituted for such important purposes and endowed with such extensive powers, should not be allowed at least equal discretion and authority.

Now mark you. Mr. Monroe says:

The evil to be particularly avoided is the violation of State rights; shunning that, it seems to be reasonable and proper that the powers of Congress should be so construed as that the General Government in its intercourse with other nations and in our internal concerns should be able to adopt all such measures lying within—

Mark you, "lying within"— the fair scope and intended to facilitate the direct objects of its powers—

"Of its powers." Are the common schools of the States within the powers of the Government of the United States? If they are, this bill is constitutional. If they are not, this bill is wrong and unconstitutional. According to Mr. Monroe, who announced the federal doctrine, the doctrine upon which my friend from Mississippi has chosen to rest his argument, it was intended that the Government of the United States—should be able to adopt all such measures lying within the fair scope and intended to facilitate the direct objects of its powers as the public welfare may require and a sound and provident policy dictate.

Does that look as if Mr. Monroe intended to go into a State and to assert power over a State institution? That is the authority upon which the Senator from Mississippi planted himself. Mr. Monroe has announced a doctrine which concurs precisely with what I have just read from Judge Cooley. Taxation and appropriation must be intended to operate within the powers of the Government which levies the tax and makes the appropriation, and must be for a national purpose as contradistinguished from a purpose within a State. There is no question of it. The proposition that one government may levy a tax to be expended in another government is preposterous. It is at war with every idea upon which any system of taxation in any representative or civilized government is founded. The taxation that under our Government is legitimate is taxation only for revenue, to enable the Government to exercise its powers and supply its needs.

We have theories of taxation. A tariff for revenue only is one; a tariff for revenue with incidental protection is another; but if the theory of the Senator from Mississippi prevails we must have a third, and it must be a tariff in order to raise revenue to give away.

The whole theory of taxation is that the Government needs it, and I plant myself upon the proposition that not one dollar, as Judge Cooley says, can be taken as taxes not needed to carry out the administration of the Government in the execution of its governmental functions. He says that any taxation not intended for that purpose is not taxation; it is simply taking it by superior force.

Here is a bill before the Senate appropriating $105,000,000 to be expended, not for a national purpose, says my friend from Mississippi, but for a purpose pertaining to the government of the States; this money raised by taxation not to be used as revenue, but to be delivered as a gift to States for a purpose over which he claims that the States have exclusive jurisdiction. I say that whenever he claims that the States have exclusive jurisdiction over public schools he will stultify himself to vote for this bill, and if he votes for the bill and the Federal Government chooses to take charge of the schools of this country he is estopped to deny their power or their right to do so. There is no mode of getting away from that proposition. It can not be evaded; it can not be dodged; it is as inexorable as fate itself.

If the Government of the United States has a right to draw money from the people by taxation to support the common schools of the States, it is because the common schools of the States are a public purpose within the powers of the Government of the United States for which those powers may be put into exercise, and the schools may be partially supported, as this bill proposes, because the Government does not choose to do more; but whenever the Government chooses to do more and to take entire possession of them, the fact that they have the power to make the appropriation is conclusive upon their right to take them and to administer them, because the laws of Congress are supreme within the jurisdiction of Congress.

In order to escape the force of that argument it has been said here that the Government grants public land, and that they have as much right and power to grant money as they have to grant land. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND], who was kind enough to give me a copy of his very able speech printed in pamphlet, devoted the great bulk of his speech to the proof of the fact that from the beginning of the Government to the present time Congress has been granting public lands in aid of education. Nobody has ever denied this; I have never denied it. I have stated that I will vote to-morrow for a bill granting public lands to the States in aid of education, because we have a right to grant them; but we have not the right to grant the people's money taken from them by taxation. The Senator from Arkansas devotes the bulk of his speech to showing instances in which the Government exercised the power to make donations of land in aid of education in the States. Here is where he makes the only argument that I find in the speech in favor of giving money as well as land:

> And as the Senator from Florida well said, if you could grant lands you could of course grant the money; if you could grant land worth a dollar and a quarter an acre you could grant the dollar and a quarter in money.

That is the Senator's argument. The senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] stated in his speech that the refinement which would make a distinction between granting land and money was too great for his comprehension, and that if one could be granted so could the other. That is the way I understood him.

Mr. GARLAND. I hardly ever interrupt a Senator, but I should like to ask the Senator from Texas a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. COKE. Certainly.

Mr. GARLAND. How did the United States get the lands that were given away by the Government in the instances that I mentioned?

Mr. COKE. They acquired some of them by war and conquest and some by purchase. They got the Louisiana country by purchase.

Mr. GARLAND. That is what I want to get at.

Mr. COKE. They got the Western Pacific slope by conquest.

Mr. GARLAND. Taking those that we got by purchase and for which we had to pay money, if we could pay the money for those lands and grant the lands after we bought them, could we not just as well have given the money as to have given the land?

Mr. COKE. That is the argument that was made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], which I would have come to presently. I was simply going to say with reference to that that Congress acquires land like that including the mouth of the Mississippi River, the Louisiana purchase, moved by great principles of public policy, and they get it under the treaty-making power, not under the general-welfare clause. Congress gets that land moved by a sagacity which looks far ahead and sees the time when this country will need all the acquired territory, and especially the mouth of a great inland sea like the Mississippi River.

Mr. HARRIS. And especially to acquire the jurisdiction over it.

Mr. COKE. And especially to acquire the jurisdiction over it, as the Senator from Tennessee suggests.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the Senator from Texas permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. COKE. Allow me to answer one at a time and then I will give way. The Senator from Arkansas asks me, if Congress can pay for land money that is drawn from the people by taxation and can give the land away, why can they not give away the money? If we could imagine an American Congress corrupt enough to go to work to trade for land for the purpose of giving it away the Senator's question would be pertinent; but when all the land we have ever acquired is acquired solely with reference to great national exigencies and purposes, the ownership of the public land is the smallest incident connected with it, and the right to acquire it includes the right to dispose of it. The right to acquire includes the jus disponendi.

Mr. GARLAND. Does not that apply to money as well as to land?

Mr. COKE. Whenever you go to war with Mexico, or Spain, or England, or any other nation, and by conquest get hold of money, as a matter of course you have a right to dispose of it; but I say when you make provision in advance for taxing the people for ten years you can not by the Constitution tax the people in order to give that money away. I will read something that Chancellor Kent says on this subject. I stated in my argument the other day a proposition which was controverted by the Senator from Mississippi, that the power of Congress over the public land was absolute. He denied it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Texas suspend for a moment? The Chair understands that President Grant is at this end of the Capitol with a personal friend, a gentleman who is attending him. General Grant of course is entitled to admission on the floor. The Chair asks unanimous consent that General Grant's friend may come with him on the floor. Is there objection? ["None!"] The Chair hears none; and it is so ordered.

Mr. COKE. Here is what Chancellor Kent, a high authority, a commentator upon our Constitution, one of the greatest lawyers and chancellors who ever lived in this country, says:

> Congress have the exclusive right of pre-emption to all Indian lands lying within the territories of the United States. This was so decided in the case of Johnson vs. McIntosh. Upon the doctrine of the court in that case, and in that of Fletcher vs. Peck, the United States own the soil as well as the jurisdiction of the immense tracts of unpatented lands included within their territories and of all the productive funds which those lands may hereafter create. The title is in the United States by the treaty of peace with Great Britain, and by subsequent cessions from France and Spain, and by cessions from the individual States, and the Indians have only a right of occupancy, and the United States possess the legal title subject to that occupancy, and with an absolute and exclusive right to extinguish the Indian title of occupancy either by conquest or purchase.

Again, says the author:

> The Constitution gave to Congress the power to dispose of and to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States and to admit new States into the Union. Since the Constitution was formed, the value and efficacy of this power have been magnified to an incalculable extent by the purchase of Louisiana and Florida; and, under the doctrine contained in the cases I have referred to, Congress have a large and magnificent portion of territory under their absolute control and disposal.

That is what Chancellor Kent says. I will now refer to what Judge Story says on this subject, and Judge Story is authority anywhere and everywhere. In his Commentaries on the Constitution he says:

> The power of Congress over the public territory is clearly exclusive and universal; and their legislation is subject to no control, but is absolute and unlimited, unless so far as it is affected by stipulations in the cessions or by the ordinance of 1787, under which any part of it has been settled.

There are two great authors, accepted authorities on the Constitution of the United States, who say that the power of Congress is absolute and unlimited. Here is what Judge Story says again:

> In the view of this doctrine, what is to be thought of the recent purchases of Louisiana and Florida? If there was danger before, how mightily must it be increased by the accession of such a vast extent of territory and such a vast increase of resources? Hitherto the experience of the country has justified no alarms on this subject from such a source. On the other hand, the public lands hold out, after the discharge of the national debt, ample revenues to be devoted to the cause of education and sound learning and to internal improvements without trenching upon the property or embarrassing the pursuits of the people by burdensome taxation. The constitutional objection to the appropriation of the other revenues of the Government to such objects has not been supposed to apply to an appropriation of the proceeds of the public lands.

Is not that a great authority? Yet the honorable Senator from Arkansas dismisses this entire question in three lines by saying, "If you can appropriate land you can appropriate money raised by taxation."

I hold in my hand the act approved June 23, 1836, providing for the distribution of the surplus in the Treasury among the several States. At that time there was a surplus of some $28,000,000 found in the Treasury, and a bill was introduced into Congress providing for the distribution of it among the several States. That bill provided for the deposit with the several States of this money in proportion to their representation in the two Houses of Congress subject to the call of the Government of the United States, to be paid back whenever it should be called for. That bill produced a great debate in the two Houses of Congress. Mr. Benton, of Missouri, led the opposition to it. He said then what has proved true since, that the deposit was provided for only as an evasion of the constitutional objection to giving it to the States. He denounced it as a fraudulent evasion of the constitutional objection to giving it to the States. It was money too that came into the Treasury, for the most part, almost exclusively from the sale of the public lands. Mr. Benton contended that it would be unconstitutional to give that money to the States, and he said that the bill was framed in that shape, knowing well that the Government would never call for it, in order to evade this constitutional objection. The Government has never yet called for a dollar of it, and Mr. Benton's prophecy has been literally fulfilled.

I challenge gentlemen who have not examined that debate to examine it. They will find that the friends of that bill—the men who voted for the distribution—placed their votes upon the ground that there was a casual, unexpected, unusual, unlooked-for amount in the Treasury and they would vote for its distribution, but each one of them declared that he would never vote for and Congress could not constitutionally legislate a surplus into the Treasury in order to give it to the States, as the pending bill proposes to do. That was declared by the friends of the bill—by the gentlemen who voted for it. They said they voted for it because the money was unexpectedly in the Treasury, and the General Government had no use for it, and therefore they would vote to deposit it with the States; but they deemed it necessary to say that they would never legislate to collect a surplus in order to distribute it, because they believed it would be unconstitutional to do it. The history of those times show these facts.

Mr. President, here are gentlemen claiming it to be in the power of the Government to tax the people, to send the tax-gatherer among them and take of their substance and give it away outside of the jurisdiction of the Government, who claim that that power exists because the United States Government has habitually been giving lands to the cause of public education. That is their great argument in support of this bill. In the one case the very definition of the term "taxation" forbids any such disposition of it, while the other stands confessedly within the unlimited and absolute power of Congress, without any restraint whatever upon Congressional discretion. That is the difference between them.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] hinged his argument very largely on the clause of the Constitution governing public land as including money under the term "or other property." Section 3, article 4, of the Constitution reads thus:

> The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

The Senator from Mississippi says that the words "or other property" include money raised under the general-welfare clause by taxation. I will read to the Senate from Paschal's Annotated Constitution. I have the report here on my desk to which he refers. Says the author:

> And the same power of making needful rules respecting the territory is in precisely the same language applied to the other property belonging to the United States, associating the power over the territory in this respect with the power over movable or personal property—that is, the ships, arms, and munitions of war which then belonged in common to the State sovereignties. And it will hardly be said that this power in relation to the last-mentioned objects was deemed necessary to be thus especially given to the new government in order to authorize it to make needful rules and regulations respecting the ships it might itself build or arms and munitions of war it might itself manufacture or provide for the public service. (Scott vs. Sanford, 19 Howard, 436.)

The court held in that case that this clause of the Constitution referred only to the public lands and territory, and to the personal property in possession of the Government at the time of the formation of the Constitution. One of their arguments in support of that position was that it would not be deemed necessary to give special power to Congress to dispose of its ships and movable property that it should acquire afterward because the power to acquire would include the power to dispose of this property. But I find that this clause is still referred to and regarded by the different commentators on the Constitution as governing later acquisitions of territory. But the argument of the court in the Dred Scott case shows that it was not necessary with reference to the newly acquired territory to have this clause, because if Congress had the power to acquire the territory, it had full power over it and to dispose of it; so it all amounts to the same thing anyhow. The honorable Senator from Mississippi hinges his entire argument upon a construction of this clause which makes the words "or property" mean money in the Treasury and placed there by taxation, which he says Congress may give away at pleasure, just as Congress may give away the public lands.

I will refer in this connection to something that was said by the Senator from Mississippi. In the beginning of his speech he said:

That the phrase "to provide for the general welfare of the United States" used in the taxing clause which I have read is not a substantive, distinct, and independent power, under which Congress may do anything deemed by it to be conducive to the general welfare, is, I think, now well settled in the practice of the legislative and executive departments, as well as by the decisions of the courts. That the Federal Government is one of delegated, limited, and enumerated powers is not now, I believe, denied.

It seems to be conceded that whenever we exercise a power we are bound to look to the Constitution for it; and that any exercise of a power not granted by the Constitution is on our part a pure usurpation. These are my views, at least, and I shall adhere to them.

Here is a declaration of State rights upon which Mr. Jefferson would have been content to have rested himself. He would have been willing to go to the world on it, for Mr. Jefferson never made a clearer or stronger statement of State-rights doctrine than the honorable Senator from Mississippi did in making this statement of the views which he says are his and which he says he intends to adhere to. In the very next column the Senator from Mississippi says:

Mr. President, if it were a new question, if I were at liberty to put for the first time a construction on the words in the taxing clause of the Constitution "to provide for the general welfare," I would say that the provision for this welfare must be by an appropriation of money to carry out some one or more of the grants specially enumerated in subsequent clauses of the Constitution. I believe Mr. Madison's view on that subject was the correct one as an original question. But, sir, that construction is no longer possible. Congress has exercised, with the consent and approbation of the people from the very beginning of the Constitution to the present time, the power to appropriate money for purposes which they judged were for the general welfare and outside of the scope of the other powers specially enumerated in the Constitution. It is now settled that Congres may appropriate money not intended to carry out any specific grant of power, but solely to provide for the general welfare of the United States.

His first would have made Thomas Jefferson happy; Alexander Hamilton would have gone into ecstacies over the last. He says the clause of the Constitution that I read just now converts property into money. He says that under the general-welfare clause Congress may tax indefinitely, and that under this other clause Congress may give away indefinitely.

Mr. GEORGE. That is your view of my position; that is all.

Mr. COKE. I have your language here; let the country judge it. I would not misrepresent the Senator, but I do say that the honorable Senator has taken the ground here, and his speech is printed, that Congress may tax under the general-welfare clause, may appropriate under the general-welfare clause, outside of any specific grant in the Constitution, and he steps down to this other section and by a violent transformation, negatived by every judge and everybody else who has ever construed it, and changes the word "property" into "money," and with the two clauses together gives Congress the power over the people of this country and their property and their revenues that the Czar of Russia in his wildest dreams never imagined himself possessed of over his subjects.

The Supreme Court of the United States in Loan Association vs. Topeka, reported in 20 Wallace, through its organ Justice Miller, discussing and denying the unlimited power of taxation and appropriation, said:

It must be conceded that there are such rights in every free government beyond the control of the state. A government which recognized no such rights, which held the lives, the liberty, and property of its citizens subject at all times to the absolute disposition and unlimited control of even the most democratic depository of power is after all but a despotism. It is true it is a despotism of the many, of the majority, if you choose to call it so, but it is none the less a despotism. It may well be doubted if a man is to hold all he is accustomed to call his own, all in which he has placed his happiness, and the security of which is essential to that happiness, under the unlimited dominion of others, whether it is not wiser that this power should be exercised by one man than by many. The theory of our Governments, State and national, is opposed to the deposit of unlimited power anywhere. The legislative, the executive, and the judicial branches of these Governments are all of limited and defined powers.

Where, I ask, is the limit to the taxing power of this Government if we may go outside of the objects embraced in the grants and purposes of the Constitution and appropriate the people's money at will, give it away, as Senators say we can, on objects outside of the jurisdiction and powers of Congress? The power of taxation, which we all admit to be necessarily unlimited as to amount, when coupled with the unlimited power of appropriation, without reference to the ends and aims and purposes prescribed in the Constitution, claimed by the supporters of this bill, creates exactly the despotism so graphically portrayed by Justice Miller.

The honorable Senator started out apparently to perform the impossible feat of riding two horses at the same time going in different directions. He advanced State-rights doctrine in the commencement of his speech that would satisfy the mind of the strictest of State-rights people, and when we get through with his argument we find him asserting powers for Congress which in my judgment have never before been claimed by any public man of high position in the United States.

The Senator is seeking to get a share in this bill without taking it with the conditions that attach to it. He says distinctly that the Government of the United States have no power over the subject of education in the States. He says the Government of the United States can make a gift of this money, but that they have no power and no authority to say that a State shall take it. There is where I take issue with him. The Government of the United States have no power to make this appropriation unless the purpose is one within its constitutional jurisdiction, and if it is within its constitutional jurisdiction it has the power to enforce it in the States. There can be no middle ground. You can not take this money and say the Government have no right to follow the money and prescribe the conditions under which it shall be expended and how it shall be expended. You are seeking to establish the power of this Government to make this appropriation, and when you establish that power you establish the jurisdiction of the Government over the public schools of the States, because unless it has that jurisdiction it has not the power to make the appropriation.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. COKE. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. If it be true that the power to control the education of the States necessarily results from the power of Congress to make a donation or appropriation in aid of it, why does not that same result follow from an appropriation of land?

Mr. COKE. It is not an appropriation but a donation of land.

Mr. GEORGE. A donation, then. Call it a donation. I shall not have a quibble about words. If Congress possesses the power to give, to appropriate, to donate, or to use money in the aid of education, and that power necessarily involves the power to direct and control education in the States, then I ask the Senator to answer the question why does not the same result follow from the same power with reference to lands?

Mr. COKE. For this reason, I will say to the Senator——

Mr. GEORGE. Now let us have it.

Mr. COKE. I think the Senator has not been paying much attention to my remarks.

Mr. GEORGE. I have been paying a great deal of attention to them.

Mr. COKE. I flattered myself that I had already explained that subject to the satisfaction of those who listened to me. It is for this reason: Congress, as Judge Story says, as Chancellor Kent says, as the Supreme Court have said in numbers of instances, possesses absolute, unlimited power over the public lands.

Mr. GEORGE. That does not answer the question. The question is whether, conceding Congress to have a certain power, another power necessarily results from that. I do not deny the power of Congress to make the appropriation of land. I do deny that when Congress makes the appropriation it can control the educational system of the States. The Senator's argument is as to money raised by taxation, that if you grant the power to give, to appropriate, to donate, you concede the power to manage and control. Why does not the same result follow when you concede the power to grant land? Is there anything in the nature of land as compared with money which would make the distinction?

Mr. COKE. The distinction is here: that Congress has no power to levy taxes and to collect money except for purposes within its constitutional jurisdiction, except to advance purposes over which it has constitutional power and where the duty rests upon Congress to give it. That is the theory of Mr. Cooley; that is the theory of Mr. Monroe; that is the theory of taxation itself. You can not lay taxes except for revenue, and revenue means money needed to execute the powers of the Government. I ask you what powers of the Government, under your construction, are being executed by the revenues paid into the States for the common-school system? In reference to land, the land is under the absolute and unlimited power of Congress. The principles applicable to taxation do not apply with reference to lands. All of our authorities, our commentators, our statesmen, our judges, admit that the Government is the proprietor, the owner of the lands, and may do with them as the Government pleases —give them away, sell them, or do anything it pleases with them.

Mr. GEORGE. Will you allow me to interrupt you again?

Mr. COKE. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to call the attention of the Senate and of the Senator himself to the fact that he evades the question which I put to him. The question is not as to the power of Congress to give this money or the power of Congress to donate land, but conceding them both for the purposes of the argument, the question I put to the Senator is, why is it that the constitutional power, if it exists, given to Congress to appropriate money involves the power to invade the States and to destroy their institutions when the same constitutional power to grant lands, unlimited as the Senator says, does not involve the same consequence?

Mr. COKE. It is in consequence of the difference between the public land and money raised by taxation. The Government has no right to raise money except when it needs revenue in order to enforce the powers of the Government, and land comes to the Government and is held by the Government as a proprietor, without limit, absolutely.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. COKE. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. The Government of the United States can give homesteads to men from all over the world as soon as they declare their intention to become citizens of the United States, and they do it. Can the Government of the United States tax the people to give those foreigners money to buy the land with?

Mr. GEORGE. And, let me ask, can it tax the people to buy the land out of which it will give the homestead?

Mr. BECK. It never did, and never thought of it; but if it acquires the land legitimately, the right to dispose of it comes with the possession. The Government does give homesteads to foreigners, but it can not tax the people to give those foreigners money to buy land with.

Mr. GEORGE. Every single acre of land that we own west of the Mississippi River——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Chair wishes to ascertain whether the Senator from Texas, who is entitled to the floor, yields to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon.

Mr. COKE. I will yield for a moment longer.

Mr. GEORGE. Every single acre of land that the United States ever owned west of the Mississippi River, every acre that it ever owned in Florida, Alabama, or Georgia, was bought by money raised by taxation.

Mr. BECK. Allow me just to add to that——

Mr. GEORGE. In a moment.

Mr. BECK. I will sit down, then. I asked the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Mississippi or to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. COKE. I will yield for a moment.

Mr. GEORGE. I would be glad to say a word.

Mr. BECK. Just this moment and I am done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair intends to understand who has the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. I am entitled to the floor, the Senator from Texas having yielded to me.

Mr. COKE. I am willing to yield for a moment to either Senator.

Mr. BECK. I did not expect to interfere in the matter, but I will now ask the Senator from Mississippi whether or not this Government has the right to give homesteads of its lands to anybody, and if it has not done it? Has it not?

Mr. GEORGE. Are you through with your question?

Mr. BECK. No; that is the first one. I assume that you will answer, "Yes; it has." Now, having done that, having done it rightfully, has the Government the right to tax this people to raise money to give to those men to buy land with?

Mr. GEORGE. I will take the Yankee way of answering the Senator, by propounding to him another question. If the Government has a right to give land for purposes of homesteads, has it a right to tax the people of this country to raise the money to buy the land to make the gift? I mean to say right here, that not one single homestead has ever been granted out of any land belonging to the United States except land purchased by the taxes of the United States. Then let me answer the Senator's question further. I deny the right of the Government, as a donation to a private individual, to grant homesteads. I deny that the Government can select out A, B, or C, or the citizens of this locality or that locality, and donate to them land. The homestead law is an offer to every man in the United States of land upon condition of settlement.

Mr. COKE. Now, I think I have been very courteous in yielding to Senators; and I wish to resume the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well.

Mr. COKE. With reference to land, when the Government goes to war and makes a conquest of the land, and when great commercial considerations, great considerations of State and national policy, make it proper that Congress should purchase land, as it did the mouth of the Mississippi and Louisiana and other territory, the ownership by the Government of the land is a mere incident to the performance of a great act of public policy. I grant the Senator that if he could find a Congress corrupt enough to go to work deliberately to make an appropriation for the purchase of lands in order to get an opportunity to give them away it would be evidence that the American Government was about on its last legs anyway, and therefore I do not think that his argument upon that point rises to the dignity of respectable sophistry.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. COKE. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator's argument is that the validity of a disposition of lands made by an act of Congress does not depend upon the purpose and the end to which the land is donated or disposed of, but on the secret intent which the members of Congress may have had in reference to it.

Mr. COKE. Oh, no; you can not put that construction upon it when you understand my argument, and as I think the country, so far as it gives any attention to the subject, will understand it. I mean to say that the great taxing power of this Government, granted to enable Congress to discharge its functions and carry on the Government—that power which Chief-Justice Marshall described truly when he said "the power to tax is the power to destroy"—can not be used because of limitations in the Constitution, and others not written in the Constitution but inherent in every free government, to raise money to be dealt with and used at the will of Congress, as the public lands can be, which Congress confessedly have absolute, unlimited, and unquestioned power and control over.

Mr. BUTLER. And land is acquired in a very different way from money.

Mr. COKE. Of course. They have been acquired by war, by diplomacy, by treaty, and by purchase, not for the purpose of giving to Congress a chance to give them away, but in pursuance of a grand national policy looking to the future of a great people. Money raised by taxation was expended in their acquisition, it is true, but when acquired and brought into possession the Government became the proprietor of them, and the absolute power of Congress attached to them. To hold that because Congress in exercise of the unlimited power the Constitution has given it over these lands has given them to the States for various purposes as donations, therefore Congress can use the great and destructive power of taxation, limited and guarded as it is, confined and jealously restricted as it is in the Constitution, to raise money to give away, seems to me utterly devoid of reason or logic.

The Senator from Mississippi is the only Senator who has essayed an argument upon this point. The argument of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] is contained in four lines. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] says the argument of the Senator from Arkansas is conclusive. The senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] says that the arguments which distinguish between the right to give land and money are too refined for his comprehension.

Mr. LAMAR. The distinguished Senator from Texas has not done me the honor to give the attention to my argument which I always accord to his.

Mr. COKE. I will say to the Senator, if he will permit me, that I read it very carefully, all of it.

Mr. LAMAR. I will repeat what I said. My remark was that the subtleties about the distinction between the grant of lands and the appropriation of money were not beyond my comprehension, as the Senator states it, but that they did not satisfy my mind.

Mr. COKE. I will stand corrected. I did not intend to misrepresent you.

Mr. LAMAR. The application, however, will also follow different from the Senator's application of it. The distinction is as old as the hills between the relation which the Government stands to its land as a proprietor and its relation to its revenue, to which it stands simply as a fiscal agent for collection and disbursement. I understand that distinction; but my point was, and I will ask the Senator's attention to it, conceding the distinction, supposing that you could drive a coach and four between the two classes of powers in the relation of the two, the intervention by Congress in the educational affairs of the State is the same; in other words, that the appropriation of money to educational purposes carries the Federal Government no further into a State than the donation of land carries the Federal Government into a State. The constitutional objection, the danger apprehended, is not the thing granted, but the purpose for which it is granted; and it makes no difference whether it be land or money, either carries the Government as far into the State as the other and no further.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, the difference between the Senator and myself is simply this, that I say the Government has not the power to collect money from the people for the purpose of paying for education in the States, because it is not in pursuance of one of the powers of the Government, whereas having acquired land over which it has unlimited power, it may give it to the States for education if it pleases. The difference is in the mode of acquiring the two things and in the powers given by the Constitution over them respectively.

Mr. LAMAR. The Senator will permit me to state my point. If I understand the Senator, his point is that the appropriation of money for educational purposes being attached to a limited power carried the Government further into a State than the donation of land, which is the result of an unlimited power.

Mr. COKE. The Senator does not understand me or I do not understand him, and I suppose we shall have to remit the matter to others to judge between us.

Mr. LAMAR. Owing to my obtuseness altogether.

Mr. COKE. I do not say that at all. I only state the fact and I will let everybody determine where the trouble is. I do not understand the Senator or he does not understand me. I say that you are providing in this bill for an appropriation of $105,000,000 to be collected by taxation from the people, which you say shall be applied not in execution of any of the powers of this Government, but to sustain public schools in the States, a purely State institution. I say the very definition of the word "taxation," the very definition of the term "revenue," shows that you have no right to collect this money from the people except in pursuance of a constitutional power to expend it upon some object within the jurisdiction of Congress. That is my position. It was not acquired for the same purpose as land. We find land in the possession of the Government and the Government gives it away to anybody and everybody, gives it to soldiers and sailors as bounties, gives it to homesteaders, gives it to railroad companies, gives it to agricultural colleges, gives it for anything and everything just because Congress has an unlimited and unstinted and absolute power over it, in the language of Judge Story, and can give it just as it pleases.

Any one who asserts that Congress has the same power by taxation under the general-welfare clause to fill the Treasury with money and then under the same clause give it away just as it would give away land asserts a construction which makes a government as absolute in the hands of Congress as ever existed on earth, without limitation and without obstruction in the exercise of its will. Gentlemen can not get away from it. No, Mr. President, the proposition is a plain one. Gentlemen can not escape it. He who votes for this bill estops himself to deny the jurisdiction of Congress over the subject of common schools in the States, because unless Congress has the jurisdiction over that subject no power rests in Congress to tax the people to raise the revenue to apply to that purpose.

Mr. GEORGE. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. COKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well; I deny the unlimited power of Congress to donate public lands. I said this:

> Senators will not, I take it, contend for such an absolute and unrestricted power. Then there must be some limitation on it. Where do we find the limitation? I find it only in the general objects and purposes of the Constitution as expressed in the clause limiting the power of Congress in reference to taxation; that the appropriation must be for the common defense or the general welfare of the United States. If this is not the limitation, there is none.

Then again I said:

> But, sir, as money is property, and the clause relied on by the Senator from Texas gives the same power over "other property belonging to the United States" as over territory or land, what authority is there for saying that the power given in this clause does not extend to money as well as to land, or for saying that all money is included within the power except money raised by taxation? There is none that I can perceive, and none has been suggested by that distinguished Senator, and none can be pointed out. So, sir, I insist that whoever, like the Senator from Texas, holds that Congress may, under the third section of article 4 of the Constitution, give land to aid in education, must, as a grammatical as well as logical necessity, concede that Congress may give any "other property belonging to the United States," including money.

It was but the reductio ad absurdum of the Senator's argument, and if the Senator is incapable of understanding my position he is incapable of understanding his own.

Mr. COKE. Everybody can judge for himself on this subject. I use my own judgment, the Senator may use his, and everybody else may use his. Here is the language of the Senator from Mississippi:

> The limitation upon the power of Congress over the land is that the land shall be disposed of for the general welfare.

Now, I take issue with him upon that, and say there is no limitation at all. Mr. Story says there is none, the Supreme Court of the United States says there is none, and Congress itself in hundreds of instances has said there is none by making grants of lands to particular States and particular charities and for purposes not affecting the general welfare. Congress can dispose of the lands as it sees proper, and the fact that it gives lands for agricultural colleges in all the States has never been held to be anything else than a grant to a particular interest in the particular States that received them. So with the individual who gets a homestead; so with the individual who gets bounty lands for military or naval services; so with those who get lands as a gift for building railroads. These do not come within the purview of the general welfare as maintained by the Senator from Mississippi. Nobody ever contended that they did. Nor has anybody but the Senator from Mississippi that I ever heard of ever yet denied the absolute, unqualified power of Congress to deal with the public lands just as it suits the will and pleasure of Congress to deal with them. Congress has granted repeatedly lands to individuals, to States, to corporations without reference to the general welfare, and a grant has rarely if ever been made by Congress of lands under such circumstances as to affect the general welfare.

Mr. President, universally on the other side of the Chamber Senators say it is the duty of the National Government to take hold of the subject of education in the States. With the exception of the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Arkansas everybody who has spoken in behalf of this bill on this side of the Chamber has declared it to be a duty of the General Government to take hold of this question of education in the States. If it is a duty, whence comes the duty? Can a duty be devolved upon the Government of the United States except through its great organic law, the Constitution? If the Constitution, either the original or the original with its amendments, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] said, as my friend from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] said, as all the gentlemen on the other side say, if the Constitution and the results of the war devolves the duty on Congress of taking hold of this question and making this appropriation, the Constitution never devolves a duty without conferring a corresponding power. If, then, there is a duty of this character resting upon Congress, there must be a corresponding power to take hold of the subject; and if the power to take hold of the subject exists, the power of Congress wherever it goes is paramount and superior to that of a State. When Congress takes hold of it, its jurisdiction over that subject is absolute and supreme. This is unquestionably true. I deny that any such duty exists. Gentlemen who demand this appropriation and assert the duty of Congress to make it estop themselves from denying the power of Congress to take hold of the subject of common schools and administering it in all the States. You can not get around that proposition. If it is a duty resting on Congress, there is no duty resting on Congress without the power goes with it to execute it.

My friend the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] suggests to me that the bill requires, as I had forgotten to state, the consent of the States to its execution in their limits. Then it is conclusive upon the face of the bill that Congress has no right to make the appropriation, because if it had the right and the power to make it and it was its duty to make it, it would have the power without the consent of the States. There is no question about that.

The honorable Senator from Mississippi says Texas need not take any of it unless she wants it. Unfortunately if the power exists with reference to one State it exists with reference to all. Texas can not exempt herself from the conditions attached to all the other States. If Congress has the power to make this appropriation, if it is the duty of Congress to make it, Congress must necessarily have the power to make it, and if Congress has the power to make it Congress can enforce it upon Texas and upon all the other States whether they desire it or not.

I believe there is no constitutional warrant for this bill. I am opposed to it also as a matter of expediency and policy. I believe that this bill is but the beginning. I believe that it is a Pandora's box from which only evil will come to the country. I believe that the Senator who votes for it if he lives five years will see that he has committed the mistake of his life in supporting it.

Mr. President, as soon as this bill passes the confession is made that the National Government can take charge of the common schools of the States. The question becomes a national one at once; it goes into party politics at once. Do you not know what that means down South? Our brethren of the North have, comparatively speaking, no negro population among them; it will not affect them, but it will affect vitally the States of the South.

Look at our postmasters in the South; look at our other Federal officers and at those who gather about them. My colleague and myself receive appeal after appeal daily from people in my State, signed by hundreds, saying, "For God's sake try to keep the Postmaster-General or the President from removing A B; he is a Republican, but he is an honest, good man, and acceptable to us, and if he is removed a stranger that we know nothing about will be put in," and when we go to the Postmaster-General or President what does it amount to? We can do nothing. Let your public schools be taken charge of by the Federal Government and your children placed under the charge of its instrumentalities while the present party remains in power, and you can imagine in every neighborhood, in every school-house, what the consequences will be; you can imagine how trouble will be fomented, how demagogues will stir up passion and strife, how the authorities of the Government remote from the scene will be made to believe things that do not exist in order that other things may be done more distasteful to you. Do you not know how things will go? The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] the other day in his remarks said, "We have mixed schools North; our people do not object to them." How long would it take to raise the question of mixed schools? How long will it take to impress Northern sentiment, where they have mixed schools universally, that as the General Government pays all expense, the white and colored should go to the same schools in the South as in the North? How long will it be? It will not be two years. The negroes will be put up by bad men to demanding equality, mixture of schools, and it will not be two years before party platforms will be formed with planks in them on this subject.

These results I see as plainly as I ever saw anything in the future. And why shall we do this thing? Why shall we walk into what, whether so intended or not, will prove a pitfall and a snare? Why shall we walk into it and surrender the powers of our home governments? Has it never occurred to any gentleman that if under the general-welfare clause Congress may make appropriations for the common schools of this country, that if under the general-welfare clause Congress can take charge of a subject like that confessedly within State jurisdiction, it can take hold of anything else among the domestic concerns of a State, and there is nothing that Congress can not do, because Congress legislates for the general welfare, and is itself the judge of what the general welfare requires; there is no limitation. Congressional discretion is the sole limitation upon Congressional power. A majority of Congress, if you admit their power over the common schools of the South, can take any other attribute of State rights and deal with it at will. Congress can regulate marriage and divorce, the descent and distribution of property, the laying out and making of roads—anything that Congress may determine is for the common defense and general welfare if this construction of the Constitution is to obtain and this bill is to pass Congress.

Mr. President, it requires no spirit of prophecy to predict what will occur if this bill passes. I refer gentlemen who are skeptical to the utterances of the Senator from Ohio on the other side of the Chamber. Who voices the public sentiment of his party or of the North more thoroughly and with greater fidelity than the distinguished Senator from Ohio on the other side? He is one of the great men of the Republican party, and in truth is one of the great men of the country. He says that he wishes, for instance, not to give Alabama a million dollars to be distributed as she pleases, but he desires Federal agencies to see to it that that million dollars is expended the greater portion of it in the black belt, because the mass of ignorance is there. Do you not see? He asserts here:

> If the United States have the right to appropriate the money, they have the right to say upon what conditions the money shall be expended. If they say we will aid the South or the Southern States to educate their illiterate children, then the United States have the power and the right to set out the principles and conditions or limitations of that grant. The greater includes the less; and if the power is given to make these appropriations at all, the power is also given to say for whose benefit the money shall be expended, how it shall be expended, where and when and how apportioned, and for what purposes. That is as clear a proposition as can be shown in Euclid or any other mathematical work.

This is but the beginning; and when you read what the honorable Senator from Ohio says now you see that he claims full power over the entire subject. I deny it. You gentlemen who support this bill concede it of necessity. The whole power is not sought to be exercised now, but as surely as the sun sets in the evening and rises in the morning it will grow and grow as party politics roll the question over, until the National Government will claim the right to take charge of the public schools and to administer them through its own instrumentalities; and if you admit the power of the Government to make this appropriation you inexorably estop yourselves from denying the power of the Government to take full control whenever the Government chooses to do so.

It takes no prophet to tell what will occur. Those who are familiar with the course of events for the last twenty years will remember many things that seemed extremely improbable which are accomplished facts now. The most pitiless, the most relentless, the most cruel and remorseless tyranny that ever moves men to action is partisan heat and partisan spirit; and once let that question get into politics, and all the negroes and their allies be warmed up on it, and they will claim the last particle of power for the Federal Government and the Republican party will concede it to them. The money being expended by the National Government, they will say we have a right to control these schools. They will control them, and the worst and most odious phase of the race trouble will be upon you and be there to remain.

That is my honest and candid opinion. Gentlemen who advocate the bill on this side, all except the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Alabama, who deny the power of control, all put it on the ground of duty under the amendments to the Constitution, and that duty carries with it necessarily the power to execute and discharge the duty.

Mr. GARLAND. Does the Senator except the Senator from Alabama or the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. COKE. I stated to-day that the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Arkansas were the only gentlemen who have spoken on this bill who do not claim it to be the duty of the Government, on account of the recent amendments and the results of the war, to take hold of this matter of education.

Mr. President, we have an overwhelming amount of testimony from all quarters, and especially from Dr. Mayo, the great educator and philanthropist, of Massachusetts, and Professor Smart, superintendent of schools in Indiana, both of whom have been all over the South and spent a great deal of time there, that the people of the South are doing their whole duty heroically in the cause of general education, and that they have accomplished wonderful results in the last fifteen years, and that great improvement is being made annually; indeed, that the improvement is greater now than at any other time heretofore.

This testimony presented by both the Senators from South Carolina and by the senior Senator from Mississippi shows that difficulties which seemed insurmountable have been overcome, and that the good work still goes on with ever-increasing vigor and earnestness.

Why, when we are doing so well, shall we abandon the good work that our people are engaged in so successfully and so heroically, a work which when it is accomplished will make them feel like men who have achieved a great end? Why, I say, shall we throw difficulties in the way of the great work by lending means which will cause them to relax their own efforts and look alone to the National Government?

Why not keep on with our own work? As an American citizen, as a patriot who desires to see men and women in this country, stalwart men and women, capable of grand and heroic deeds, men and women who can maintain local government at home and when necessary the integrity of the Union against foes from abroad, I want to see that sort of population raised; they are the mainstay of the autonomy of the States and of the integrity of the Union.

I say let this bill alone; let the people alone; let them go on in their own way, for they are doing well now. The time is not far off when you will find all the illiterates of the South brought under educational influences, and influences that are deeply rooted, because cultivated at home, influences that will last, and you will find prosperity all over that land.

Now, Mr. President, I have said about all I desire to say in reference to this bill and a great deal more than I intended to say when I got up. I feel strongly, I feel earnestly and deeply, the unwisdom of the bill as well as its gross unconstitutionality.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, it is with considerable embarrassment that I rise to address the Senate after so able, exhaustive, and conclusive an argument as that to which the Senate has just listened. I think the opponents of the bill might well rest their opposition on the argument which has just been submitted by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], an argument that I think is unanswerable and conclusive of the whole question. But as I shall have to vote on the bill, I desire to make some remarks in justification of the vote which I shall give.

At the commencement of this debate, or very early in the debate, I expressed my opposition to the bill and assigned some of the reasons on which that opposition is based. I then said that I did not believe there was any constitutional warrant or authority for Congress to pass the bill, and that if such authority existed I believed the passage of the bill would be injudicious and unwise. Subsequent reflection as well as everything that I have heard in the debate has but confirmed the opinion which I then expressed. All that I have heard satisfies me that there is no justification for the collection of revenue from the people of this country and its application to the subject of education in the States; and all that I have heard in debate in reference to the impolicy of the matter has strengthened my conviction on that subject. If the power existed, if Congress had ample authority to make the appropriation of money, it would be the most unwise measure that has passed the Senate for years.

I ask the friends of this measure to point out the power upon which they predicate the right of Congress to pass the bill, for I confess that after listening to all the arguments that have been presented there has been no substantial reason deduced from the Constitution to justify the opinion that Congress has authority to pass it.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] on another question, I believe upon the resolution of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] in reference to diseases among cattle, found authority in what is generally known as "the general-welfare" clause of the Constitution to make that appropriation and to make all similar appropriations, and I think he referred to that provision as sustaining this bill. That Senator gave a construction to that clause of the Constitution which he thought warranted the expenditure of money for the purposes mentioned in the resolution of the Senator from Kansas, and if I understood him, also for this educational scheme, and he cited various appropriations that had been made by Congress as justifying that construction. The only limitation the Senator from Arkansas placed on the power to appropriate money by Congress was that it must be a matter of a public, general nature, and if I understood his argument aright he contended that Congress had clear and indisputable authority to make appropriations from the public Treasury for any and every purpose that it might think promoted the general welfare. The views of the Senator from Arkansas have been adopted by all the friends of this bill to whom I have listened in this debate. They have all placed the authority for the passage of the bill on the clause of the Constitution relating to the general welfare.

I can not concur in the construction placed upon that provision of the Constitution by these Senators. If their construction is correct, there was no need for any of the specific grants of power given to Congress in the Constitution. Under that clause, if their construction is correct, there is no limitation upon the power of Congress in the appropriation of public money or the objects to which such appropriation could be applied. Congress could have raised and equipped armies and built navies at pleasure without specific grants of power for that purpose. In fact, if under the general-welfare clause it could raise and appropriate money at pleasure and apply it according to its own will and discretion, many of the specific grants of power were not only unnecessary but superfluous and unwise.

I am aware, Mr. President, that the construction put upon that clause of the Constitution by the friends of this bill has been insisted upon before. The advocates of every scheme to take money out of the public Treasury for any and every purpose frequently intrench themselves behind this construction of that provision of the Constitution; whenever no other authority can be invoked they fall back on the general-welfare clause and find authority in that for every purpose which they desire.

The words "general welfare" occurred in the Articles of Confederation, and their import as there used was plain and obvious. Under the Articles of Confederation no authority was given to Congress to raise revenue by taxation of any kind; but Congress called upon the States for contributions, which were voluntarily made by the States, and formed a common fund for the maintenance of the Confederation. The eighth article of confederation provided:

> All charges of war and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defense or general welfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common treasury, which shall be supplied by the several States in proportion to the value of all land within each State granted to or surveyed for any person, as such land and the buildings and improvements thereon shall be estimated, according to such mode as the United States in Congress assembled shall from time to time direct and appoint.

The meaning of the words general welfare as used in that article simply import that the common fund supplied by all the States should be applied to purposes in which all had a common interest in contradistinction to local objects in which only some of the States were interested.

The same words incorporated in the eighth section of article 1 of the Constitution have the same meaning that they had in the Articles of Confederation, namely, that the money raised by taxation must be applied to purposes in which the people of all the States are alike interested in contradistinction to purposes in which only a part are interested. Congress is to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States by the application of the money which is collected in carrying out some one or more of the powers mentioned and granted in the Constitution. This was the construction contended for by Mr. Madison and others who made the Constitution, the construction acted upon by the men who formerly sat in this Chamber, who knew what was intended by the fathers of the Government, and felt compelled to respect and obey that intention. Any other construction of that provision of the Constitution places the taxing power in Congress, to be used for any purpose which the whim or caprice of a majority of its members may declare to be for the general welfare of the country.

Can any one believe that the members of the convention which made the Constitution or the States they represented intended to grant to Congress an unlimited power of taxation, unlimited as to the amount which might be extorted through this power from the people of this country and unlimited as to the objects to which it might be appropriated? We all know from the debates in the convention and from the history of that period with what reluctance the taxing power to any extent was conferred upon the Federal Government. The people of this country had felt the oppression of the taxing power claimed by the British Parliament, and had been driven by such oppressions into revolution to relieve themselves from it. They were therefore naturally reluctant to grant to the Federal Government, formed by the Constitution, any measure of the taxing power which had oppressed them while under British rule. Nothing but the failure of the States to respond to the calls made upon them for contribution under the Articles of Confederation would have induced them to grant any power of taxation whatever to Congress.

Can it be supposed that with this distrust and apprehension of Federal power they intended to confer by anything in the Constitution an absolute power in Congress to lay and collect duties, imposts, and other taxes for any and every purpose and to any extent which the caprice and whim of a majority of Congress might suggest? Such a conclusion is not only unreasonable, but preposterous and absurd; yet such an unlimited power of taxation is claimed by the friends of this bill in the construction which they place upon that clause of the Constitution relating to the general welfare. Again, I repeat, if the construction contended for by the friends of this bill is correct, then many of the grants of power enumerated in the subsequent clauses of the eighth section of article 1 of the Constitution are useless, conferring no authority but what could have been exercised under the general-welfare clause.

I ask, Mr. President, if this construction of that clause is correct, could not Congress, without any specific grant of power in that direction, have raised armies for the defense of the country; could they not have raised and maintained navies for the defense of the country, and, in a word, could they not have done anything which in their judgment tended to promote the general welfare of the country?

There have always been in this country, as there are to-day, persons in private and official positions who favor a loose and latitudinarian construction of the powers of the Federal Government. Such men were in the convention that formed the Constitution and endeavored to embody in that instrument provisions which would give to the Federal Government the most ample powers and which would have deprived the States of rights essential to the welfare of the people. Failing to secure these extended powers in the Constitution, those who favored these views on Federal power have sought to obtain by construction of the Constitution the powers for the Federal Government which were denied by the convention.

The struggle between the advocates of Federal power and those who insisted upon a strict construction of the Constitution had well-nigh subsided prior to the late war. The exigencies of that period furnished the excuse if not the necessity for the liberal construction of the powers of the Government, which was carried in some instances to the extent of palpable usurpation of authority. Whether we shall ever return to a just conception of the powers of the General Government and the rights of the States and the people under the Constitution is a problem which the future alone can solve. From what I have heard in this debate I fear the day is distant when the limitation intended to be placed upon Congress over the subject of taxation will command that respect in this Chamber which formerly obtained not only here but by thoughtful men throughout the country.

Mr. President, if the construction now claimed by the friends of this bill is correct, where is the limitation of the power of taxation by Congress? The purpose of this bill is to exercise the taxing power to promote common-school education. That is its avowed object. But I say if they can exercise the taxing power for the purpose of sustaining or establishing common schools for the education of the people, may they not under the same power establish schools of other grades? May they not establish colleges and universities, schools of the fine arts, or any other description of schools whatever? Where is the limitation? If the construction put upon the Constitution by the friends of this bill is correct, that Congress has the power to appropriate money for common-school purposes in the States of this Union, I ask may they not exercise the same power for the purpose of establishing every other class and grade of schools whatever?

I am aware that the argument has been in this case that the education of the masses has become necessary to the right discharge of the duties of citizenship; but the education to qualify men to read their ballots before they deposit them is not all that may hereafter be deemed necessary as proper qualifications for citizenship. Other qualifications may be considered equally necessary, such as moral and perhaps religious training, to elevate them higher still in the qualifications of citizenship. If you can educate for the purpose of qualification for citizenship at all, where is the limit? May you not educate to the highest point in morality as well as in mere scholastic education? If this power exists for educational purposes in the States, I see no limit whatever to that authority, either in reference to the purpose for which the tax shall be raised or the character of education to which it may be applied.

It will be noticed that this bill does not propose to appropriate merely the money now in the Treasury to educational purposes, but to raise the money by future taxation. In the remarks I made at the commencement of this debate I referred to the distinction between the distribution of the surplus in the Treasury in 1836 and the provisions of this bill, and the Senator from New Hampshire who has charge of the bill in some remarks which he made pointed out that I attempted to raise a distinction between the appropriation of money already in the Treasury and the exercise of the taxing power for the purpose of placing money in the Treasury to be distributed hereafter. Well, sir, that is not a new question. That question has been here before. That was one of the questions that were before Congress in 1836. I desire to call attention to the discussion at that period on that bill as illustrating, as I think conclusively, that there is no authority in Congress to raise revenue for the purpose of distribution or appropriation to educational purposes in the State or any other purposes of that character.

The history of that bill for the distribution of the surplus in the Treasury in 1836 is familiar to every one. Under the operations of the tariff of 1824 and the tariff of 1828 and the strict economy that was practiced in the administration of the Government there was likely to be a surplus in the Treasury for which the Government had no need, and General Jackson, President of the United States at that time, in his message to Congress in 1829, called the attention of Congress to the fact that soon the public debt occasioned by the war of 1812 would be discharged, and that there would be in the Treasury a considerable surplus to be dealt with, and as it was apprehended that if it remained in the Treasury it would lead to extravagant legislation on works of internal improvement and for other purposes, he called the attention of Congress to the necessity of making some provision for getting clear of that surplus. I have his message here. He was exceedingly anxious that some disposition should be made in order that extravagant appropriations of money by Congress might not be attempted. General Jackson doubted, however, whether that surplus could be distributed among the States, which he thought was the very best thing that could be done with it provided there was constitutional authority for it. He doubted whether the Constitution allowed a distribution of the surplus then in the Treasury among the States and suggested an amendment to the Constitution. In his message of 1829, from which I will read, he said:

> After the extinction of the public debt it is not probable that any adjustment of the tariff, upon principles satisfactory to the people of the Union, will, until a remote period, if ever, leave the Government without a considerable surplus in the Treasury, beyond what may be required for its current service. As then the period approaches when the application of the revenue to the payment of debt will cease, the disposition of the surplus will present a subject for the serious deliberation of Congress, and it may be fortunate for the country that it is yet to be decided. Considered in connection with the difficulties which have heretofore attended appropriations for purposes of internal improvement, and with those which this experience tells us will certainly arise, whenever power over such subjects may be exercised by the General Government, it is hoped that it may lead to the adoption of some plan which will reconcile the diversified interests of the States, and strengthen the bonds which unite them. Every member of the Union, in peace and in war, will be benefited by the improvement of inland navigation and the construction of highways in the several States. Let us then endeavor to attain this benefit in a mode which will be satisfactory to all. That hitherto adopted has, by many of our fellow-citizens, been deprecated as an infraction of the Constitution, while by others it has been viewed as inexpedient. All feel that it has been employed at the expense of harmony in the legislative councils.

To avoid these evils, it appears to me that the most safe, just, and federal disposition which could be made of the surplus revenue would be its apportionment among the several States according to their ratio of representation, and should this measure not be found warranted by the Constitution, that it would be expedient to propose to the States an amendment authorizing it. I regard an appeal to the source of power, in cases of real doubt, and where its exercise is deemed indispensable to the general welfare, as among the most sacred of all our obligations.

Thus it will be seen that General Jackson at that time, while he favored an equitable scheme of distribution of the money among the several States of this Union as the best remedy for the relief of the Treasury to avoid unwise legislation, which he feared would obtain unless some use was made of it, suggested the doubt of the constitutionality and actually suggested the necessity of an amendment to the Constitution in order that such a distribution might be made among the States. That, it will be remembered, was a distribution of the surplus then in the Treasury. It was not money to be acquired thereafter by taxation of the people, but it was money that was in the Treasury at the time and for which the Government had no necessity. He repeated the recommendation in his message of 1830, and so impressed was he that if the surplus remained where it was then, in the vaults of the deposit banks and subject to appropriation by Congress, it would lead to unwise and extravagant appropriations, that in 1830 he renews his recommendation for some disposition to be made of that surplus which would avoid that danger that he saw in the future.

Subsequently Mr. Calhoun introduced a bill in Congress for the distribution of the surplus revenue then in the Treasury, amounting to over $30,000,000, and a distribution annually of any surplus at the end of each year up to 1842. But Mr. Calhoun thought that such a distribution of the money would require an amendment to the Constitution. I have his speech here upon that bill. This is what he said:

I have now stated the leading objections to the several modes of disposing of the surplus revenue which I propose to consider, and the question again recurs, what shall be done with the surplus? The Senate is not uninformed of my opinion on this important subject. Foreseeing that there would be a large surplus and the mischievous consequences that must follow, I moved during the last session for a select committee, which among other measures reported a resolution so to amend the Constitution as to authorize a temporary distribution of the surplus among the States; but so many doubted whether there would be a surplus at the time that it rendered all prospect of carrying the resolution hopeless. My opinion still remains unchanged that the measure then proposed was the best, but so rapid has been the accumulation of the surplus, even beyond my calculation, and so pressing the danger, that what would have been then an efficient remedy would now be too tardy to meet the danger, and of course another remedy must be devised more speedy in its action.

So that Mr. Calhoun when he introduced his bill for the distribution conceded that an amendment of the Constitution was necessary even to distribute among the States the money then in the Treasury. Mr. Calhoun's bill was for the distribution of surplus then in the Treasury and an annual distribution of any surplus that should remain at the end of every year until 1842. Mr. Webster, not believing that there was power to distribute a fund yet to arise, amended the bill of Mr. Calhoun so as to limit the distribution to the money then in the Treasury, and with that amendment it was referred to a select committee. That committee reported back the bill, rejecting that part of Mr. Calhoun's bill which proposed to extend the distribution to 1842 and confining it to a distribution of the surplus then in the Treasury, but also providing that instead of being an actual distribution of the money it should be a deposit with the States, and that certificates should be issued by the States and delivered to the Secretary of the Treasury as security for that deposit. Still an act of Congress was deemed necessary before that money could be rendered available, and hence Mr. Tallmadge moved an amendment that the certificates proposed by the committee should be made assignable by the Secretary of the Treasury without the intervention of Congress, that he might realize therefrom the money whenever the necessities of the Government should require it. It was in that shape that the bill passed. In the discussions upon that bill this question as to the power of Congress to raise money for the purpose of distribution among the States was considered. Mr. Tallmadge in the debate said:

I have feared that it might create a too great dependence of the States on the General Government. I will not now say anything of the constitutional question further than to express my opinion that Congress has no power to raise revenue for the purpose of distribution. But when we find a surplus on our hands, without any design from our legislation to produce it, it presents a different question. The time has now arrived, the contingencies have now happened, when the President anticipated such a surplus; the surplus is on hand and it will continue to increase far beyond our appropriations. It is in vain to shut our eyes to the fact; we may deceive ourselves, but we can not deceive others. This surplus can not be disposed of by appropriations, unless of the most extravagant character. Will the people tolerate appropriations for the mere purpose of getting rid of a surplus? No, sir; I apprehend not. They will justify their representatives in making liberal appropriations for all objects of national defense. Extravagant expenditures for the sole object of disposing of the surplus revenue are, in my judgment, far more dangerous than any objections which I have heard urged against a distribution among the States.

But that was a distribution of a surplus already in the Treasury, and Mr. Tallmadge says he does not admit that there is any right in Congress to raise revenue for the purpose of appropriation. That is exactly what this bill proposes. The bill proposes to levy taxes and to raise for the next ten years money to be distributed among the States. That doctrine did not find a single advocate in 1836. It was repudiated by every gentleman who expressed himself upon it; Mr. Calhoun expressing a doubt of the power of Congress to distribute the surplus in the Treasury without an amendment of the Constitution. The constitutional objection, however, was obviated by making it a deposit with the States for which the States should give certificates to be assignable to the Secretary of the Treasury without any intervention of Congress whatever.

I do not propose to detain the Senate very long; but the idea expressed by Mr. Tallmadge was emphatically expressed by General Jackson in 1832 in his veto message of the land bill. I will read an extract from that message:

It has been supposed that with all the reductions in our revenue which could be speedily effected by Congress without injury to the substantial interests of the country there might be for some years to come a surplus of moneys in the Treasury, and that there was in principle no objection to returning them to the people by whom they were paid. As the literal accomplishment of such an object is obviously impracticable, it was thought admissible, as the nearest approximation to it, to hand them over to the State governments, the more immediate representatives of the people, to be by them applied to the benefit of those to whom they properly belonged. The principle and the object were to return to the people an unavoidable surplus of revenue which might have been paid by them under a system which could not at once be abandoned; but even this resource, which at one time seemed to be almost the only alternative to save the General Government from grasping unlimited power over internal improvements, was suggested with doubts of its constitutionality.

But this bill assumes a new principle. Its object is not to return to the people an unavoidable surplus of revenue paid in by them, but to create a surplus for distribution among the States. It seizes the entire proceeds of one source of revenue and sets them apart as a surplus, making it necessary to raise the moneys for supporting the Government and meeting the general charges from other sources. It even throws the entire land system upon the customs for its support and makes the public lands a perpetual charge upon the Treasury. It does not return to the people moneys accidentally or unavoidably paid by them to the Government, by which they are not wanted, but compels the people to pay moneys into the Treasury for the mere purpose of creating a surplus for distribution to their State governments.

However willing I might be that any unavoidable surplus in the Treasury should be returned to the people through their State governments, I can not assent to the principle that a surplus may be created for the purpose of distribution. Viewing this bill as, in effect, assuming the right not only to create a surplus for that purpose, but to divide the contents of the Treasury among the States, without limitation, from whatever source they may be derived, and asserting the power to raise and appropriate money for the support of every State government and institution as well as for making every local improvement, however trivial, I can not give it my assent.

Those were the views of General Jackson upon the question of raising revenue for the purpose of distribution. While he conceded that under exceptional cases it might become necessary to distribute among the States, if the constitutional power existed, any surplus in the revenue, he emphatically declares that he can not give his assent to any proposition to raise money from any source for the purpose of distribution.

This bill is not a bill like that of 1836. There is no surplus in the Treasury to-day which it is proposed to distribute or to appropriate to educational purposes. We have a public debt amounting to a billion and a half of dollars, and there is a portion of that public debt which to-day can be reached by the application of the money in the Treasury. There is not a single dollar of surplus to-day in the Treasury but what may be used in the extinguishment of a portion of the public debt.

The bill now under consideration has no reference whatever to any surplus that is in the Treasury, but its whole intendment and purpose is to exercise the taxing power conferred upon Congress for the purpose of raising money for distribution or appropriation to educational purposes in the State—a very different and distinct question from that which was before Congress in 1836. I repeat, that even that question, when the surplus was on hand and when it threatened to lead to extravagant legislation and by some was thought not to be in very safe custody, as it was distributed among the banks of deposit—some thirty-odd, I believe, in number—while Congress was exceedingly anxious to make some distribution of that surplus, there were even then doubts existing as to the power of Congress without a constitutional amendment to distribute it among the States; but with reference to raising revenue to be thereafter distributed there was not a single voice in Congress in favor of any such proposition. Those who referred to that question spoke in the most emphatic terms in opposition to any such measure. Mr. Tallmadge expressed himself decidedly upon that question, as well as General Jackson in his veto message of the land bill of 1832. They did not admit that Congress could exercise its taxing power for the purpose of raising revenue for distribution among the several States in any shape whatever.

I can find no warrant in the Constitution for the passage of this bill. On the contrary, I think it is violative of the spirit and intendment of the Constitution. I do not believe that it was ever the intention of the people of this country, of the convention which framed the Constitution or of the States which adopted it, to confer the taxing power upon Congress to be used for any such purpose; and with that conviction resting upon my mind I certainly can not vote for this bill, however much benefit the State which I represent might derive from it.

But I am opposed to this measure because I think it is impolitic and unwise. I think instead of proving a blessing to the States of this Union it will prove a curse. As was well said by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] this morning, if you once induce the States of this Union to look to the Federal Government for appropriations for common schools you at once introduce into the States of the Union a bone of contention. What he said upon that subject meets with my hearty approval and concurrence. Once let it be understood that Congress proposes to raise money for distribution among the States, and what would be the consequence? Your Representatives in the other House would be elected on the question whether they would vote for large taxes and large expenditures for that purpose. Even Senators in this body would be selected in certain States in the Union with reference to the votes they would cast upon that question. It would become a leading political topic; the question of qualifications and fitness of men would not be the criterion by which they would be selected as representatives in either branch of Congress; but the only question asked would be whether they would conform their votes to the wishes of their constituents to levy taxation upon the people for the purpose of distribution among them.

Mr. President, if there were no other objections than the one I have just named I believe that that is a sufficient objection to justify the rejection of this bill. But I hold that that is not the only objection. If Congress possesses the constitutional power to appropriate money for educational purposes, it follows, as I believe logically and conclusively, that Congress may follow that money and direct its application. I firmly believe that if Congress can constitutionally appropriate money for the purpose of aiding the schools in the States of this Union, it may appropriate money for the purpose of establishing a Federal system of education in the States independent of the States themselves.

Does not Congress now follow the money which it appropriates to various objects? When a public building is erected in any of the States of the Union does not the Federal Government expend the money? When Congress appropriates money to rivers and harbors, who is it that superintends the expenditure of that money? The Federal authority. If Congress can appropriate constitutionally money for educational purposes, Congress will have the power, as I believe, to follow that money and direct its application either to the common schools already existing in the States or to the establishment of an independent Federal system of education in all the States of this Union.

I do not believe that any such power resides in Congress over the subject of education, and therefore I do not believe that any such power exists in Congress to make this appropriation. If the one can be constitutionally done, I hold that the other can be. I do not say that it would be wise or proper in the Federal Government to attempt to follow the money if we make the appropriation. I am not speaking upon the question of the propriety of doing it; I am only speaking of the right of Congress to follow the money which it appropriates, if it can appropriate it constitutionally.

I say to my Southern friends on this side of the Chamber, who seem so anxious for this money, if they are prepared to surrender State control over their educational interests they perhaps will be justified in voting for this bill, but if they are not prepared to surrender the State control of their educational interests to the General Government I can not see with what consistency they can vote for a measure which may lead, and probably will lead, in the future to the control of their school systems.

Mr. President, I believe that this bill is fraught with evil and only evil. Whatever amount of money we may give to any State, that State will be ultimately the sufferer and loser by the appropriation. I know that a great many people desire to have appropriations from the Federal Government. I know that we are educating the people of this country to look to Congress for relief in many things. As soon as a flood occurs in any section of the country forthwith an application comes up to Congress for relief; if a fire occurs it is the same; and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] the other day went so far as to say that appropriations for the relief of persons injured by a cyclone would be within the constitutional power of Congress. We are educating the people of this country not to depend upon themselves but to look to the General Government, and I think that it is an evil which we ought to correct by refusing appropriations for any such illegitimate purposes.

In justification of this measure a great many instances of appropriations have been cited. Some of them were instances where appropriations could properly be made; for instance, the establishment of a naval school or of a military school falls legitimately within the express grant of power to Congress. Congress is authorized to raise and support armies, and as an incident to that to qualify men to take command of their armies and to establish a military school for that purpose. Congress is authorized to provide for the Navy, and as an incident to that has the right to establish a naval school for the training of men for that service. So that there is nothing that I can see in appropriations of that kind which are unauthorized by express grant of power. I believe the appropriation for the purpose of the centennial, which has been referred to in this debate as furnishing an illustration of the power to pass this bill, was a loan, to a certain extent, and I am not sure but that a part of the money then advanced has been returned to the Government. But there have been many appropriations made, I confess, for which I believe there was no warrant in the Constitution. It, however, can not alter the Constitution because such appropriations have been made, nor can unauthorized and improper appropriations heretofore made justify similar appropriations now or hereafter.

I understood the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] to say that if this was an original question then he would not insist that the appropriation should be made, but relying upon the precedents which had been cited as a construction of the power of Congress, he was now prepared to acquiesce in it. Sir, precedents of the exercise of illegitimate power by Congress can never change the meaning of the Constitution. You can as well say that acts of injustice or acts of inhumanity would justify further violation of the eternal laws of justice and of humanity as that an appropriation made by Congress for which there was no authority can justify other appropriations hereafter to be made of the same character.

Mr. President, I hope the bill will not pass. I have expressed my opposition to it thus briefly as a justification for the vote which I shall give upon it. I shall detain the Senate no further.

Mr. GEORGE. I suppose it is expected that I should make some reply to the argument made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], but I do not desire to make it this evening.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Mississippi if he would object to a motion to go into executive session or to adjourn?

Mr. GEORGE. I prefer it, because I do not want to go on now.

Mr. BLAIR. It is difficult to hear what is being said.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir. I make the statement that I do not desire to go on this evening; it is too late; but I should like to have the floor at 2 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CALL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not hear the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the Senator to withhold his motion for one moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida withdraw his motion?

Mr. CALL. I withdraw it for a moment, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to have an opportunity of offering, so that they may be before the Senate for consideration, three propositions that I wish to offer as amendments to the bill when it is again before the Senate and open to amendment. I propose to amend section 1 by substituting what I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois gives notice that at the proper time he will move an amendment, which will be read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the first section of the bill by substituting for that section the following:

That for ten years next after the passage of this act there shall be annually appropriated from the money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the following sums, to wit: The first year, the sum of $15,000,000; the second year, the sum of $17,500,000; the third year, the sum of $20,000,000; the fourth year, the sum of $18,000,000; the fifth year, the sum of $16,000,000; the sixth year, the sum of $14,000,000; the seventh year, the sum of $12,000,000; the eighth year, the sum of $10,000,000; the ninth year, the sum of $8,000,000; the tenth year, the sum of $6,000,000; ten annual appropriations in all, when appropriations under this act shall cease; which several sums shall be expended to secure the benefits of common-school education to all the children of the school age mentioned hereafter living in the United States.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask that the amendment be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be printed.

Mr. LOGAN. I also wish to offer an amendment as an additional section, to come in after the last section now in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois gives notice that at the proper time he will move an amendment, which will be read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill the following additional section:

SEC. —. There shall also be appropriated and set apart the sum of $2,000,000, which shall be allotted to the several States and Territories on the same basis as the moneys appropriated in the first section, which shall be known as the common-school-house fund, to be paid out annually to each State and Territory at the end of the year on proof of the expenditure made during such year, which shall be expended for the erection and construction of school-houses, for the use and occupation of the pupils attending the common schools in the sparsely populated districts thereof, where the local communities shall be comparatively unable to bear the burdens of taxation. Such school-houses shall be built in accordance with modern plans, which plans shall be furnished free on application to the Bureau of Education in Washington: Provided, however, That not more than $100 shall be paid from said fund toward the cost of any single school-house nor more than one-half of the cost thereof in any case; and the State or Territory shall annually make full report of all expenditures from the school-house fund to the Secretary of the Interior, as in case of other moneys received under the provisions of this act.

Mr. LOGAN. Following that I shall propose at the proper time this amendment to be added to the bill as an additional section:

SEC. —. No State or Territory that does not distribute the moneys received for common-school purposes equally for the education of all the children, without distinction of race or color, shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. These proposed amendments will be printed, if there be no objection.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAIR. I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BLAIR. For a moment.

Mr. BECK. I was endeavoring to see if I could not perfect an amendment to the bill laying a tax not exceeding 2 per cent. upon all incomes exceeding $5,000 as a special fund to meet the expenses created by the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I am informed that several Senators desire to speak. The Senator who has the floor for that purpose, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], I understand would prefer not to go on to-night. If there is any other Senator who would speak to-night I hope there will be no adjournment, but that he will take this opportunity to be heard now.

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senate does not desire to adjourn now I will surrender my right to the floor and let anybody take it.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire, in view of the fact that the naval appropriation bill is now ready for consideration by the Senate, when it is his purpose to bring this bill to a vote in some form or if he has any purpose on the subject?

Mr. BLAIR. It is my desire to bring the bill to a vote immediately, but it is utterly impossible to do it. Senators have a right to be heard and desire to be heard, and I have no power to shut off freedom of speech in the Senate. I know of no power on earth that can do it or that desires to do it. The Senate never has exhibited any inclination to do it, certainly. I would much prefer personally that the debate proceed to-night, as there is much to be said yet. If no Senator desires to take the floor I shall not oppose an adjournment or an executive session at this time. I wish, however, to say that I shall ask the Senate to-morrow morning to take up the bill immediately after the conclusion of the morning business, instead of proceeding to the Calendar.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I shall object to that.

Mr. BLAIR. I shall ask it unless some Senator seriously objects.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I will seriously object.

Mr. BLAIR. Possibly I shall ask it even against the serious objection of my friend, for he may change his mind by the morning.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. There is not the least probability of that.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to add further, and then I will yield to the Senator from Mississippi, that I shall ask the Senate to dispose of the bill to-morrow, no matter how protracted may be the session. I think we ought to get through with the bill to-morrow. If we can not do it, it will be for the Senate to take such action as it may see fit, but I shall hope for a conclusion to-morrow night some time.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope so. I hope the Senator will press the bill to a vote to-morrow.

Mr. BLAIR. I am very anxious indeed to do so. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. LAMAR. I desire to make a few remarks. I shall not consume the time of the Senate for more than four or five minutes, and as a part of my remarks I send to the Secretary's desk a portion of a lecture delivered by Dr. Mayo, at Vicksburg, on the 26th of last month.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I will conclude what I was saying before that is read, if the Senator pleases. I give notice at this time that to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to dispose of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi having the floor asks to have read a certain paper which he has sent to the desk. It will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

I have been for four years among the people of the South and, without vanity, I think I may say I know the situation and can speak in plain English a word to Senators from the North who do not realize the true state of the case, and to Senators from the South who are troubled with constitutional scruples in the premises. To Northern Senators I say, without fear of contradiction, that the Southern people can not, from their own resources, supply the means to educate their children in any such way as the necessities of American citizenship demand. To-day the sixteen Southern States have on the ground a system of free schools, for both races, for which they are paying $15,000,000 annually. They have built up this system within fifteen years, a little better each year; and no people under similar circumstances ever did such a work for popular education, in so short a time, since the world began. The desire to educate the children is every day increasing. The danger of the present state of affairs is appalling. I have looked through and through the whole shadow side of Southern life, and I see no evil therein that can not be gradually overcome by the education of the children in a good common school; for wherever that American institution exists all good things come to the front and perilous things retire and the American idea prevails.

But it is idle for Northern Senators to suppose that this work can be done without the help of the whole people. To postpone it is to invite perils yet unknown and expose one-half our country to calamities that will make our past troubles appear light and endurable. I believe that money given to these States will be honestly and practically applied, and the result of such giving will do more to bind our people together than all other means within the national power. To Senators from the South I would say your people need and ask for that education for their children which will help them to become good citizens of the Republic. An intelligent people can be trusted to take care of the Constitution, but no body of statesmen is wise enough to do it if the people are ignorant. I can not speak to-night what I feel concerning this matter as I go up and down this Southern land. I come from a State that is renowned for its schools, and from the city of Boston, that perhaps on the whole does more for its children than any city on the earth. I am glad I come from that city and have my own honest pride in her great renown. But last Monday I came to your little city of Vicksburg. In the States tributary to your town a larger territory is under water than the whole State of Massachusetts, and more property will be disturbed in a month than New England pays for education in five years. Our boat was loaded to the water's edge with the poor people rescued from the flood. Yet I was met by a deputation of your foremost citizens, and now for two nights this house has been crowded to hear me talk about the children. Your colored people send me an address of welcome and ask me to tell them what I know of education.

I remember that little more than twenty years ago Vicksburg was a battlefield, and around me are the scars of war, and twice as many dead soldiers sleep on your hills than living people walk your streets. I remember that again and again since that day you have faced the pestilence, that even your river has turned the cold shoulder, that the open country for hundreds of miles about you is not yet on its feet from the overwhelming destruction of war. Yet I find your people taxing themselves almost twice the percentage of Boston for public schools, still compelled to teach the children in unsuitable buildings, and even your open country imposing almost as heavy a tax on its valuation as our proud Athens of the Bay State. When I see such things—and I see them in every one of your twelve States through which I have traveled in the past four years—I thank God that I live in the same country with the people of the South, who out of their poverty and amid all their difficulties are doing such things for the children. It seems to me that a Congress that would turn its back on the cry of these millions of children and youths for the bread of knowledge and give them the stones of constitutional theory and sectional distrust and partisan policy instead, would be a Congress itself sorely in need of education, of patriotism, and of that statesmanship whose highest achievement is in helping the people to help themselves and giving to the Republic a new generation fit to deal with the mighty era that is already upon us. Let our honored Senators and Representatives at Washington give one week to the children who will inherit the Republic and will write the history of what they are doing to-day.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator from Mississippi design to speak?

Mr. LAMAR. I do not; my object is accomplished.

Mr. BLAIR. There are a few things that I want to put in the possession of the Senate, and I will do it now. They are in the nature of facts.

As bearing upon the question whether in the Southern States there is generally among the intelligent and educated and influential people a desire for this appropriation based upon the necessity that exists for it, I desire to read from a private letter to Dr. Curry, of the Peabody fund. It is from a distinguished professor in the State of South Carolina. I should betray no confidence in giving his name, because since this debate has been in progress he has personally written to me avowing the authorship of this extract which Dr. Curry sent me without giving me his authority. This is a communication of Dr. Curry to me. He says:

A letter before me—

Which is from this distinguished South Carolina professor—

A letter before me from one of the best scholars and most active school men in the South says: "The argument is unanswerable. Here we stand face to face with the necessity. All over this State the taxes of the white people can not be made to suffice for the education of both white and colored; with the utmost good-will, the resources are deficient. Nothing but national aid can solve the problem, and without it there is great danger that the effort may be abandoned in despair."

That last sentence—

Dr. Curry goes on to say—is unspeakably important. If this Congress adjourns without the aid, I shall almost surrender hope in reference to the future of our country. May God save our land.

I have received also——

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me?

Mr. BLAIR. I yield for a question.

Mr. BECK. How far does the Senator think intelligent suffrage will be likely to be promoted by the passage of the sixteenth amendment reported upon favorably the other day, I believe, from his committee?

Mr. BLAIR. In reference to female suffrage?

Mr. BECK. Yes.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to make a speech on that.

Mr. BECK. I should like to hear it.

Mr. BLAIR. Perhaps it had better not be made now.

Mr. BECK. How far would it aid the people if we were to throw in all the negro women as voters?

Mr. BLAIR. The negro women are superior to the negro men. There is no question about that, and I do not know that there is any question about the same fact in reference to women of any other race or of races generally; but I shall not at this moment, I think, be diverted from the purpose for which I rose.

I now read a communication received yesterday from the corresponding secretary of the National Education Society, of which I gave the Senate some account in my opening address on this bill.

Bishop M. Simpson, of Pa., President. Hon. J. O. Wilson, of D. C., Treasurer.
Professor C. C. Painter, of Tenn., Corresponding Secretary.

Executive Committee: Rev. M. E. Strieby, D. D., of New York, Chairman; Rev. J. C. Hartzell, D. D., of Louisiana; Rev. J. M. Gregory, D. D., of Illinois; Hon. J. L. M. Curry, of Virginia; General S. C. Armstrong, of Virginia; Rev. R. H. Allen, D. D., of Tennessee; Rev. Dr. Twing, of New York; President A. S. Haygood, of Georgia; Mr. Benjamin Tatum, of New York; Rev. C. R. Bliss, of Illinois; Rev. Robert Colyer, D. D., of New York.

NATIONAL EDUCATION COMMITTEE.
(OBJECT—NATIONAL AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.)
INDIAN RIGHTS ASSOCIATION, 27 GRANT PLACE.
Washington, D. C., March 31, 1884.

ment of its first annual meeting, that you may have some idea of the truth of this statement.

The constituency whom this committee represents have contributed since the war for education in the South a sum of money aggregating, it is estimated, nearly one-half as large as that proposed in your bill. This was given freely by our most enlightened and best citizens, and every dollar of it expresses their earnest conviction that the appropriation asked for is needed and must be granted if this work is to be done; for it is great beyond the possibilities of private charity and local self-help. I assure you their interest in the work is not simply that of Christian philanthropists, but of enlightened citizens, and they ask with almost absolute unanimity that as citizens, through national legislation, they may be allowed to help in this work by such an appropriation from the national Treasury.

The teachers sent out by the educational societies represented on this committee went South when to do so as teachers was to risk life; they prosecuted their work in spite of abuse, contempt, and social ostracism until they have conquered prejudices, disarmed hostility, and compelled respect. They have demonstrated to all doubters that the negro can be educated and convinced all opposers that he ought to be educated, and now they have the most earnest co-operation and support of those who once bitterly opposed their work.

I fully believe that not one can be found among these heroes and heroines in this great fight, whose opinions, it is respectfully submitted, are entitled to some consideration, who does not earnestly support the chief propositions of your bill. That aid ought and must be given if this work is to be done, and that the South may be fully trusted to discharge the trust with which this bill would charge them.

The resolution which I am commissioned to present through you from this association is as follows:

"Resolved, That the constitutional duty to provide for the safety of the Republic is in full force at all times and in face of all dangers; and that in urging Congress to deal immediately and adequately with the problem of illiteracy, which has assumed appalling proportions, we are only asking it to meet this obligation, the discharge of which can not be called an exercise of charity, the neglect of which must prove a fatal crime."

Yours, very truly,

C. C. PAINTER,
Corresponding Secretary Nebraska Educational Commission.

Hon. H. W. BLAIR,
United States Senate.

As bearing upon the question whether the amount which it is proposed to distribute here is excessive I will send an article to the Secretary and ask him to read it, prefacing the reading by the remark that it is a condensation made by the Boston Journal in an editorial of a very extensive collection of statistics published in the Christian Union, and which have been collected with great effort and accuracy, and which I think to be as reliable as anything that is available.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Secretary will read the paper.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE NATIONAL DRINK BILL.

The Christian Union publishes a graphic chart, exhibiting the direct annual cost to the consumers in this country of alcoholic liquors as compared with expenditures for other purposes. The chart exhibits the relative outgo for eleven different purposes by means of heavy black columns of varying height—three-quarters of an inch representing an expenditure of $100,000,000. At one side, extending over half the page, towers the column representing the national-drink bill; at the other extreme, and showing by contrast hardly more than a line, is the block which stands for the total annual expenditures for Christian missions, home and foreign. The bill for drink is $900,000,000; the bill for missions is $5,500,000. Between these come the expenditures for bread, $505,000,000; for meat, $303,000,000; for iron and steel, $290,000,000; for woolen goods, $237,000,000; for sawed lumber, $233,000,000; for cotton goods, $210,000,000; for boots and shoes, $196,000,000; for sugar and molasses, $155,000,000; and for public education, $85,000,000.

The statistics on which this chart is based are drawn from the last census and from other reliable authorities. Lest the figures of the drink bill be thought to be a wild and careless estimate, the manner in which they have been obtained should be indicated. The internal revenue on distilled spirits in 1883 was $74,308,775; the rate is 90 cents a gallon; and the quantity of liquor taxed is therefore 82,631,972 gallons. A certain part of this was used for mechanical and scientific purposes, but most of it was drunk as a beverage. Sold by the glass, it would cost the consumer about $6 a gallon. The whole amount at this rate would aggregate $495,791,832. The tax on fermented liquors in the same year amounted to $16,900,615, which, at $1 per barrel, represents an equal number of barrels, containing, at 31 gallons to the barrel, 523,919,065 gallons. At 5 cents a glass, and twelve glasses to the gallon, this costs the consumer $314,351,439. The imported liquors estimated on a similar basis cost the consumer at least $100,000,000, which brings the total cost up to more than $900,000,000.

No account is taken of native wines, nor of liquor, "crooked whisky," and other which escapes taxation; and the cost of these may be taken as a fair offset to the distilled liquor employed for mechanical and scientific purposes. The estimate of $900,000,000 is therefore by no means a high estimate. It is midway between the estimates of the New York Tribune and the National Temperance Almanac. Fourteen years ago, when the Government revenue from distilled liquor was about $20,000,000 less than now, and the national income from fermented liquor was one-third what it now is, Dr. Young, the Government statistician, estimated the nation's drink bill at $600,000,000. On this basis, the estimate of the Christian Union article can not be excessive. This is only the direct cost, and takes no account of the burdens of pauperism, idiocy, insanity, and crime which are directly traceable to drink. These are facts and figures which should arrest the attention of the most careless, and should strengthen every reasonable effort which is made to restrain and diminish the almost immeasurable evils which flow from the drink habit.

Mr. BLAIR. Here are some figures. I put these facts in now because Senators are entitled to know of their existence as early as possible as bearing upon the condition of the Southern white population before the war and the bearing of the war upon their existing condition. I read from a statement compiled from the census by Dr. Curry, of the Peabody fund. He says:

By the census of 1860 the white population of the North was about 19,000,000, and of the South about 8,000,000. The North at that time had 205 colleges, 1,407 professors, and 29,044 students, while the South had 262 colleges, 1488 professors, and 27,055 students. For these institutions the North expended $1,514,688 and on academic institutions $4,663,749. For similar institutions the South expended, respectively, $1,662,419 and $4,328,127.

That is to say, with a white population a little less than one-third of the white population of the North there were fifty-seven more colleges in the South than in the North; there were eighty-one more professors of colleges in the South than in the North, and in the North an excess of students of only 1,989. And upon the matter of expenditure the account stood thus: For collegiate education within their own borders the South expended $147,731 more than was expended by the North, and in academic education the North expended $335,622 more than the South.

I have here a compilation of the school laws of three of the Southern States. There has been some inquiry in reference to the existing status of school laws throughout the southern portion of our country, and the Commissioner of Education at my request has prepared this brief abstract of the laws of three States, North Carolina, Mississippi, and Louisiana, and I understand him to say that the features which are to be found in the laws of those three States comprise all the features or substantially all the features to be found in the laws of any of the Southern States relating to their school system. This is the compilation:

North Carolina.—In North Carolina the State treasurer receives the school funds and holds them as a special deposit. They are paid out only on the warrant of the State auditor, issued on the order of the State board of education in favor of county treasurers for moneys apportioned to the counties according to their school population by the State board, the order to be duly indorsed by the county treasurer in whose favor it is drawn. The funds are reapportioned by the county boards to the several white and colored school districts according to the number of children in each between 6 and 21 years of age. The county treasurer pays from the funds of the respective districts orders drawn by the district-school committee, and in case they are for the payment of teachers' salaries they are to be indorsed by the teacher and countersigned by the county superintendent, who is to do this only after the teacher in whose favor it is drawn shall have made to him all required reports, and each teacher must be duly certificated by a county examiner. All officers handling the money are required to give bonds with ample securities.

Mississippi, 1880.—The auditor of public accounts distributes the common-school fund among the counties according to the number of children in each. The distribution is made by the issuance of auditor's warrants on the State treasury, payable to the county treasurer. They pay money out upon the order of the county superintendent of education, approved by the board of supervisors, except in case of teachers' warrants, which shall be paid upon approval of the superintendent alone.

Separate schools are maintained for the different races, but no preferences are shown to either by the law.

Each treasurer is duly bonded, and each teacher must be licensed by the county superintendent.

Louisiana.—In Louisiana the State superintendent quarterly apportions the State school fund, which is in the hands of the State treasurer, to the parishes according to the number of persons in them between the ages of 6 and 18. The amounts apportioned are paid by the State treasurer to parish treasurers. They are then consolidated with local funds and reapportioned by the parish boards of school directors among the several ward or school districts of the parish according to the number of persons of school age in each. The parish treasurer pays out the money to the credit of each district on warrants drawn by the president and countersigned by the secretary of the parish school board for purposes specified by the board. The warrants are kept on file, and, with the account books of the treasurer, are always open to the inspection of all persons. The persons through whose hands the moneys pass are required to give sufficient bonds. Several provisions of the school also relate to the care of these funds, and tend to protect their expenditure and use from neglect or dishonesty. Parish boards are "to exercise proper vigilance in securing for the schools of the parish all funds destined for the support thereof." The State board of education may restrain the parish officers from paying salaries to teachers and officers who have not performed their duties. Parish boards and treasurers are required "to examine and scrutinize personally or by experts the accounts of their predecessors in office in order to find out if their administration of the school funds has been in accordance with law, and to report all delinquencies discovered to the district attorney of the district and to the State board of education."

Teachers are required to be duly certificated.

With reference to the school laws in Kentucky, I learn on further inquiry that the repeal of the obnoxious law—that is obnoxious to some—which threw the education of the colored people practically upon themselves, instead of being now pending in the Legislature of that State, was consummated by the last Legislature, the Legislature of 1881, and there is now no feature of equality in reference to the education of the school children of any State that is not to be found in the school system of Kentucky. The distribution is upon the basis of school population, without any reference to race, color, or previous condition.

Mr. VEST. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 1, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday.

Mr. WOOD. I move that the Clerk omit reading the mere formal part of introducing bills and joint resolutions.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Journal was then read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. SNYDER, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. GARRISON, for one week from to-day, on account of important business.

To Mr. FORAN, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. GREEN, for one week, on account of sickness in his family.

GENERAL GEORGE BALDY.

On motion of Mr. KELLOGG, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of General George Baldy; and the same were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MISS HARRIETT HEMPKEN.

On motion of Mr. KELLOGG, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Miss Harriett Hempken, and the same were referred to the Committee on Claims.

LEGISLATION FOR UTAH TERRITORY.

On motion of Mr. CAINE, by unanimous consent, the House ordered to be printed as a document the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah, protesting against the passage of bills now pending in Congress or any other measures inimical to the people of said Territory until after a full investigation by a Congressional committee; which was read yesterday, and referred to the Committee on the Territories.

TESTING-MACHINE, WATERTOWN ARSENAL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Chief of Ordnance submitting a letter from the American Society of Civil Engineers with reference to the United States testing-machine at the Watertown arsenal and the appropriations to be made therefor; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

FINANCIAL DEPARTMENT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA GOVERNMENT.

Mr. FIEDLER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that the financial departments of the District of Columbia have not been conducted in a proper and business-like manner, and grave doubts exist as to the correctness of the accounts rendered, owing to the loose manner in which the books have been kept; and

Whereas it is charged that the taxes have not been collected in strict conformity of law: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to have a thorough examination made of all accounts, &c., appertaining to the finances of the District of Columbia, and they are empowered to send for books and persons, and to employ such expert accountants as they may deem necessary; all expense arising from said investigation to be defrayed out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CALKINS. That had better be referred.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. REED. I have no objection to its going to a committee, but I object to any action upon it at present.

Mr. FIEDLER. Then I ask its reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 4738) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the Commercial National Bank of Chicago.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read.

Mr. WELLER. I object.

Mr. VANCE. I am directed by the Committee on Patents to ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 672) to amend section 4887 of the Revised Statutes, with reference to the patent laws.

Mr. WASHBURN. I object.

Mr. REAGAN. Let us have the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour for the call of committees.

CLERK COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of submitting a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the resolution of Mr. HEWITT that a clerk be allowed the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department during the sessions of this Congress, with a compensation at the rate of $6 per day, respectfully report that the amount and importance of the business assigned to the consideration of the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department under the rules of the House seem to justify the allowance of a clerk to said Committee during the sessions of the present Congress. They therefore recommend the passage of the following substitute, namely:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department be allowed a clerk during the sessions of the Forty-eighth Congress, who shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the same rate now paid House committee clerks who are employed during the sessions only."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the substitute reported by the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that the employment of this clerk be limited to the present session. I suppose there would be no objection to that. I move to amend, therefore, by limiting it to this session.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. Mr. Speaker, I am not authorized to accept any such amendment as that, and I hope it will not be adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. The expense is to be paid out of the contingent fund, and if so, it ought to be confined to the present session.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I understand that has not been the rule with respect to the others. They have not been confined to the session only, but have been employed during the Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman charged with the investigations to be made by that committee will state that this work is to extend beyond this session, I will withdraw the objection. But if the investigation is to be confined to the session only, I do not see the necessity of having a clerk whose term of office will extend beyond the session.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I have no knowledge as to whether the investigations or the work of the committee will extend beyond the session or not.

Mr. REED. The chairman of the committee will extend beyond this session.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. It is impossible to foretell what are to be the duties of the committee in that regard. I presume that when they are done with the clerk they will let us know.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very likely. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana to limit the employment of the clerk to the present session of Congress.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 44, noes 22.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the adoption of the amendment reported by the committee as amended.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 34, noes 11.

Mr. WELLER. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. ELLIS and Mr. ERMENTROUT were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 101, noes 8.

Mr. WELLER. There being such a decided vote in the affirmative, I will withdraw the point that no quorum has voted.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the resolution as amended.

Mr. DUNN. I rise to a question of order. I think the last vote was on the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The last vote was on the adoption of the substitute reported by the committee for the original resolution. The House referred to the committee a resolution, for which the committee reported a substitute. The House has just agreed to the substitute. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ERMENTROUT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been called for. The regular order is the call of committees for reports. The Committee on Elections.

Mr. ELLIS. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope we will have a call of committees this morning.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I make the point of order that it is not in order to move to dispense with the morning hour after the call of committees has commenced.

The SPEAKER. No committee had reported, and the gentleman from Louisiana was on the floor at the time the Chair announced the first committee. A vote of two-thirds is required.

The question being taken, the morning hour was not dispensed with (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof).

NATURALIZATION LAWS.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 1629, a bill (H. R. 6402) to amend the naturalization laws; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, also reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 5849) limiting the time for the presentation and payment of claims against the United States; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the amendments and accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ALABAMA CLAIMS COMMISSION.

Mr. TUCKER. I am also instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report a bill in lieu of a number of bills referred to the committee relating to the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims.

Bills of the following titles, reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary, were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 683) amendatory of and supplementary to an act entitled "An act re-establishing the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award," approved June 5, 1882;

A bill (H. R. 4933) to define and supplement an "act establishing the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award," approved June 5, 1882;

A bill (H. R. 2336) providing for the payment of judgments when rendered in the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims;

A bill (H. R. 3422) to extend the duration of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 4400) to define and supplement an act entitled "An act re-establishing the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award," approved June 5, 1882; and

A bill (H. R. 1811) re-establishing the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, and for other purposes.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, in lieu of the above bills, reported a bill (H. R. 6403) to define and supplement an act entitled "An act re-establishing the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award," approved June 5, 1882; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. TUCKER. I request also that the views of the minority of the committee may be printed with the report of the majority.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

SECTION 840, REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 2576) to repeal section 840 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the amendments and accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

INSPECTION OF LIVE-STOCK, ETC.

Mr. REAGAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported, in lieu of sundry bills and a joint resolution referred to that committee, a bill (H. R. 6405) to provide for the inspection of live-stock, hog products, and dressed meats, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. Does the bill make an appropriation?

Mr. REAGAN. It does not. It contemplates the appointment of officers by the Treasury, but they are officers to be paid by fees and not out of the Treasury.

The bill was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLARDY. I desire leave to submit the views of the minority, and ask that they be printed with the report of the majority.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The following bills and joint resolution, reported back from the Committee on Commerce, were laid on the table:

A bill (H. R. 1899) to prohibit imports from foreign governments who unjustly discriminate against the products of the United States;

A bill (H. R. 1905) authorizing the President to prohibit by proclamation the importation of goods in certain cases;

A bill (H. R. 4056) providing for the inspection and certification of the quality of meat products for exportation; and

TRADE-DOLLAR.

Mr. DOWD. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business under consideration at the adjournment yesterday, being the bill (H. R. 4976) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PUSEY] is entitled to the floor, having thirty-five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. PUSEY. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, I desire briefly to submit some arguments in advocacy of the provisions of this bill.

The trade-dollar in no sense constitutes any part of the circulating medium of this country to-day. Public policy and national good faith require its speedy retirement. Under the provisions of this short bill this can be accomplished without loss to the country or without loss to the present holders of this anomalous coin.

The provisions of this bill are simple, direct, equitable, and comprehensive. Section 1 reaches that class of holders who are remote from our subtreasuries. My people have not a subtreasury within five hundred miles of them. Other gentlemen on this floor represent constituencies who have not a subtreasury within one thousand miles of them.

Section 1 provides for those holders by making this coin receivable for public dues. They can walk across the street to the deputy collectors of internal revenue and buy their revenue-stamps, or they can go to the post-office and buy their post-office stamps and use the coin at par. Section 2 provides for the large holders in those great money centers, where they can use it by going immediately to the subtreasury and getting the standard silver dollars in exchange. Section 3 provides that these trade-dollars shall be sent by these treasurers and subtreasurers to the coinage mints of the country to be recoined into standard dollars, thereby giving to the country a uniform silver circulation.

Now, I will say, Mr. Speaker, within parliamentary usage, I hope, that up to section 4 of this bill the committee were practically unanimous, but when we reached section 4 there was a division, and there is a minority report of this committee on the provisions of that section. That provides that when this coin is sent to the coinage mints it shall be treated as silver bullion and deducted from the monthly purchases of silver bullion by the Treasury. Our chairman, who is the author of the minority report, says: "I do not want the law of February 28, 1878, interfered with." I say in reply that practically we do not interfere with it. There is one provision of that law that requires the Treasury of the United States to purchase monthly not less than $2,000,000 of silver bullion.

Now, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the committee, why is it that that provision was put in there? Was it not to enable the Treasury of the United States or the mints of the United States to coin not less than 2,000,000 per month of standard dollars? It was not put in there for any such purpose as to make a steady market of $2,000,000 a month to silver-bullion dealers. We do not legislate in that direction. You practically do not affect the monthly coinage of standard dollars. The clink and music of the Bland dollar will be heard just as it is now. The Government of this country will still take $7,200,000 per annum as seigniorage on this money of the people. Now, is this a strike at the silver-bullion dealer? By no means. We are under no obligation to furnish a market for him. You ask, what will he do? He will do precisely as my farmers do, store the product until there is a market for it, with the certain assurance that the Government is a purchaser within a very few months.

In round numbers, there have been thirty-five millions of this anomalous money coined. It is estimated by the statistics of our custom-houses, the manifests of our vessels, and the approximate amounts brought by immigrants to this country, that all of this $35,000,000, with the exception of possibly $7,000,000, have, in those dusky nations of the East, gone into the coinage of the sycee-silver, into subsidiary coin, into ornaments, and into the arts, so that there is left practically, at the maximum calculation, in all not to exceed $8,000,000.

I think, Mr. Speaker, the argument on this whole bill should rest here. We have suffered ourselves to issue a coin, the trade-dollar, for foreign circulation. The Constitution gives us control over the coinage of silver and gold, the regulation of its value, and the regulation of foreign coins within the United States. But here is a native coin for foreign circulation. I will admit, Mr. Speaker, that it is the child of an impure alliance. Yet the Government finds itself in the position that it has to assume the guardianship of this prodigal. It has on it the devices and insignia of this Government, and the honor and good faith of this nation demand that it should be redeemed.

It may be said that speculators of this country have this coin. That may be true to some extent. But is not that true of every commodity? But the fact is that outside of the great moneyed centers this coin is scattered among the laborers of this country. I will say as a practical business man that I know of thousands of dollars of this anomalous coin that are deposited in the banks of the country as a special deposit. Under the provisions of this law the man who has $10, $20, or $50 can walk right across the street and get dollar for dollar in revenue-stamps and postage-stamps.

Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to pose as a doctrinaire upon any of the economic questions that may come before this House. I would rather be instrumental in crystallizing the intelligence and experience of this House in formulating some practical legislation before the country.

Mr. Speaker, when debate on this bill closed by reason of adjournment on the evening of the 28th, it had been circumscribed to reasons for and objections to the adoption of the four sections of this bill providing for the retirement of the trade-dollar. In the license and latitude given the discussion of all public measures before the House, this debate has not proven exceptional, but has encompassed the history of legislation since 1853 on the silver question. What may have been wise in 1853, with the changed statistics of our precious metals would be subject to just criticism in 1884. The results immediately preceding and leading to the enactment of the silver legislation of 1853 are unprecedented in the history of this or any other country.

In 1848 commenced what is known as the golden era, which in one decade flooded this country with over $550,000,000 in gold, and during which period the native product of silver scarcely reached $550,000. Add to this natural cause the fact that France had thrown her mints open to free coinage, and British India had adopted the silver standard, and you have the solution of the silver legislation of 1853, by which our subsidiary silver coins were debased nearly 8 per cent. and gold and silver were forced to part company. This plethora of gold stimulated every branch of industry, ran real estate up to fabulous prices, increased the price of living, and decreased the purchasing power of the gold dollar, followed by reaction, which led to partial suspension of specie payment, to be succeeded in turn by national suspension of specie payment in December, 1861.

In the mean time, however, what is known as the silver era in the United States had arisen. The product of gold had reached its maximum of $69,000,000 annual product when the silver mines of Nevada and the States and Territories west of the Missouri began to pour into the market their tribute of silver, as a further evidence of the inexhaustible resources of this favored country, augmenting in volume until the product of 1883 is in excess of that of gold by more than $20,000,000, thus restoring by natural causes, measurably, the normal ratio of our precious mentals, estranged by existing causes in 1853. What were the extraneous causes, aside from any absence of equilibrium in our precious metals, which led to our legislation of 1873, which gave to the world the trade-dollar, and that of February 28, 1878, known as the "silver flood," and which was but a legitimate sequence of the legislation of 1873.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I entertain very pronounced convictions on this question—convictions forced upon me in a lifetime spent in the busy marts of trade and as a silent but somewhat observant student of our financial policy since 1865. And yet, speaking in this presence and to the country, I do not know of a sentiment which I could utter, I do not know of a principle which I might seek to ingraft upon the legislation of this country on the silver question which might not be subject to modification by the ceaseless and ever-changing tide of international commerce. When the war closed and a nation's life had been preserved by the heroic sacrifices of her people, a policy, a financial policy, was adopted by those in power which has done more, in my judgment, to concentrate the distributed wealth of this entire nation into the colossal fortunes of the few than has all our wasteful endowment of our public domain upon railroad corporations.

When the tragic history of our civil war has lost its glamour some Albert Gallatin may be found who will yet write the financial tragedy of this nation, commencing in 1865 and closing on that memorable 1st day of January, 1879, when the curtain dropped, bearing the inscription, "Forced resumption by means of contraction." I hope that history in all its significant details may be found in that book which will be so opportunely cast upon the market a few weeks preceding the Chicago convention, whose author was a prominent actor in that drama. If so, it will be found that the policy of McCulloch, Boutwell, Bristow, and Sherman overshadowed the nation with a financial cloud of more than Cimmerian darkness, which left in its wake prostrate industries, ruined fortunes, paralyzed energies, filling our land with mourning and our streets and byways with starving tramps—the fruitful mother of the riots of 1877, and the mournful episode to a nation's triumph in arms.

All honor, then, to the men who stood up in these Halls on the 28th of February, 1878, and passed the silver bill over the veto of President Hayes. In the full light of contemporaneous history, I believe it was the throes of a brave people striving to utilize to the utmost the resources of our country—not to avert, but "to temper the winds to the shorn lambs." With our policy on the silver question, superadded to the more important fact that in the ten years embraced between 1873 and 1883 the agricultural products of this country are estimated to have been twenty billions of dollars' worth, of which we exported over six thousand millions in value, while other exported articles were enormous, in all far exceeding in the aggregate that of the forty years previous, bringing us a balance of trade of over $110,000,000—in this you have the causes which made specie resumption possible.

But was specie resumption on the 1st day of January, 1879, a truthful annunciation of the nation's ability to pay its demand liabilities in gold? On that day there was outstanding, first, gold certificates, $21,580,700; second, matured United States bonds, $22,140,642; third, matured interest, $4,081,903; fourth, legal-tender notes, $346,681,016; aggregate demand liabilities being $394,484,261. Gold in the Treasury, $135,382,639 to accomplish this. This is the way the books stood on that day after Sherman had sold $100,000,000 of our 4½ per cent. bonds for gold to the New York and London syndicate, paying them ⅛ to ½ per cent. commission, and we have been paying and will have to pay interest on these bonds until maturity. What a climax to a prologue of consummate financial crime! Not one dollar of legal-tender notes was presented for redemption, and our silver certificates have so steadily grown in favor that more than $90,000,000 of gold coin has been sent to our Treasury in exchange for them. You gentlemen from New England and the great financial cities of this country, who in this debate are clamoring that we should stop the coinage of the silver dollar, should have more respect for silver as a potent agency, as in truth the factor solving the problem of national finance.

Condition of gold and silver in our Treasury March 29, 1884.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Gold coin in Treasury and mints | | $150,249,735 24 |
| Gold bullion | | 60,624,333 10 |
| | | 210,974,068 34 |
| Gold certificates outstanding | | 69,854,820 00 |
| | | 141,919,248 34 |
| Silver bullion | | 5,043,824 61 |
| Standard silver dollars | | 129,002,117 00 |
| | | 134,045,941 61 |
| Silver certificates outstanding | | 96,985,821 00 |
| | | 38,060,120 61 |

Again, if this bill becomes a law, the trade-dollars will be practically retired within ninety days after its passage, which will be an expansion of silver-certificate circulation so far as that monthly redemption is in excess of the $2,000,000 silver bullion monthly purchase which the Treasurer is required to make under one of the provisions of the law of February 28, 1878. Our silver and gold, with their representatives, gold and silver certificates, together with the reserved authority of the Government over the volume of legal-tender notes to be issued, constitute the automatic power of the Government over its monetary affairs, which in time will be self-adjusting, placing us where our Treasury has not been since 1865, beyond the control of the moneyed syndicates of the world. As the three hundred and forty millions of national-bank circulation, founded on the debt of the nation, shall be gradually retired by the redemption of the hypothecated bonds, the monthly issue of our gold and silver certificates will supply the deficiency and fill the vacuum.

What then, Mr. Speaker, should be the policy of this Congress in reference to our silver coinage? Primarily, to reach a purer coinage. With our inexhaustible resources in mineral wealth, no country can afford a purer and better coinage than the United States. An axiomatic truth in trade is, "Manufacture the best article and your market is assured." Money derives its power from its quality of universal acceptability, and labor is the real measure of the exchangeable value of all commodities. Gold and silver is the money of the laborer; give it them, as God has given it to us, in the greatest purity. It is not the money of the great corporation, of commerce, and the bank. They deal in the "money of account."

But the toiling millions keep no bank accounts; their money should not only at all times have the greatest purchasing power, but as far as possible possess enduring and intrinsic uniformity in value. To preserve the natural ratio of these precious metals has been the problem of the ages. In the days of Christ it stood as 9 to 1. It has varied through all the centuries, and our present standard is 16 to 1. No country has any trouble with this silver question which exports more than it imports, or sells more than it buys. Legislation may do very much to sustain the equilibrium of these precious metals. Some go so far as to say it may practically control it, through the metric system of coinage, when the two metals are blended in their natural ratio.

In this age of quick transit and almost constant contact of the great commercial nations of the earth revulsions can be but temporary; the ebb of the receding tide eastward but augments the flow westward for investment in our products. If we can fully restore the confidence of the people in the precious metals, begetting thereby the habit of prizing our coin, it will lead to frugality and thrift, the surest foundation of a people's permanent prosperity, placing in power those who are in full sympathy with our people on this question, and not under the domination of corporate power. We can infuse into our diplomacy a vigor and earnestness on this question which will be more powerful than the Latin Union, and which will take our money where our flag goes, to be received and respected by all peoples.

Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to print some tabulated statements in reference to our product of the precious metals and the fluctuations in their value.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

PRODUCT WEST OF THE MISSOURI RIVER.

WELLS, FARGO & CO. EXPRESS AND BANKING,
San Francisco, January 1, 1884.

DEAR SIR: The following is a copy of our annual statement of precious metals produced in the States and Territories west of the Missouri River (including British Columbia and receipts by express from the west coast of Mexico) during 1883, which shows aggregate products as follows: Gold, $29,236,492; silver, $47,229,649; copper, $5,683,921; lead, $8,163,550—total gross result, $90,313,612.

California shows a decrease in gold of $1,629,028, and an increase of silver of $969,844. Nevada shows a falling off of $1,591,755. The Comstock shows an increase of $392,468, but there is a decrease in the product of Eureka district of $1,519,124. With the exception of Montana and Idaho, there is a decrease in the product of the other States and Territories.

The facilities afforded for the transportation of bullion, ores, and base metals by the extension of railroads into the mining districts increase the difficulty of verifying the reports of the products from several important localities, and the general tendency is to exaggeration when the actual values are not obtainable from authentic sources; but the aggregate result, as shown herein, we think may be relied on with reasonable confidence as approximately correct.

The exports of silver during the present year to Japan, China, India, the Straits, &c., have been as follows: From Southampton, $33,260,237; from Marseilles, $851,840; from San Francisco, $4,498,546—total, $38,610,623, as against $43,266,000 in 1882.

JNO. J. VALENTINE,
Vice-President and General Superintendent.

Hon. W. H. M. PUSEY, Washington, D. C.

The following table of the relative value of silver at various times will be of interest here. We quote the price for 412½ grains troy, this being the weight of the standard dollars, and by adding to it the value of 7½ grains, about 1½ cents, the reader will have the relative value of the trade-dollar:

| | Value. | | Value. |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1848 | 100.88 | 1864 | 104.06 |
| 1849 | 101.30 | 1865 | 103.52 |
| 1850 | 101.83 | 1866 | 103.63 |
| 1851 | 103.42 | 1867 | 102.67 |
| 1852 | 102.57 | 1868 | 102.57 |
| 1853 | 104.26 | 1869 | 102.47 |
| 1854 | 104.26 | 1870 | 102.67 |
| 1855 | 103.95 | 1871 | 102.57 |
| 1856 | 103.95 | 1872 | 102.25 |
| 1857 | 104.69 | 1873 | 102.46 |
| 1858 | 103.95 | 1874 | 98.86 |
| 1859 | 105.22 | 1875 | 96.43 |
| 1860 | 104.58 | 1876 | 89.22 |
| 1861 | 103.10 | 1877 | 92.22 |
| 1862 | 104.16 | 1878 | 88.85 |
| 1863 | 104.06 | | |

Fluctuation in the price of silver like that since 1875 the world never witnessed before. In the month of July, 1876, it touched bottom, and the gold value of 412½ grains of silver declined below 80 cents, recovered, however, as rapidly, and the average market value of the metal contained in the standard dollar during 1883 has varied between 84½ and 86 cents.

Mr. CASSIDY. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to antagonize that portion of the bill reported by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures which provides simply for the redemption and recoinage of the trade-dollar. I believe that we are all agreed that this should be done. We differ only as to the manner. Uniformity in the silver coinage is desirable, and it is quite as much desired by the friends of silver as by its enemies. Notwithstanding that the trade-dollar is a better dollar intrinsically than the standard dollar (it contains several grains more of bullion), the enemies of silver have unwarrantably worked up a feeling against it, until now no course seems open to us but to transform the trade-dollars into standard dollars. The trade-dollar was found by the enemies of silver to be the weak spot in the general subject where a successful assault could be made. It was lacking in the legal-tender element. With the aid of jobbers and speculators it was not a difficult task to bring this coin into discredit and disfavor among the people. It is only an evidence of what the allied forces of the oppositon would do with the standard dollar if they had the power.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to that feature of the bill which provides that there shall be a suspension of the purchase of silver bullion for coinage into standard dollars pending the redemption and recoinage of the trade-dollar. I oppose it on the broad ground that it is a practical and substantial contraction of the volume of silver currency in circulation among the people. This is the vital point put in issue. Let me read section 4 of this innocent little bill, which is as follows:

SEC. 4. That the trade-dollars so received at the coinage mints shall be regarded and treated as silver bullion, and, at their bullion value, shall be deducted from the amount of bullion required to be purchased and coined by the act of February 28, 1878.

There you have it. The trade-dollar when redeemed is to be treated as so much bullion. There can be no mistake about that. And under this section we are called upon to suspend the operation of the law of 1878 (a poor, half-way measure at the best) until all of the trade-dollars in circulation among the people shall have been reconverted into standard dollars.

Of course no man can tell how many of these trade-dollars are outstanding in this country. We can only estimate as to the number. The Director of the Mint, who may have better facilities than any one else, estimates that the amount will approximate $9,000,000. He may or may not be correct in his estimate. Other well-informed sources place the amount at $15,000,000. No one, I believe, goes above this latter sum. We all know that there were within a fraction of $36,000,000 coined originally. We all know further that these coins were designed in the beginning wholly for the export trade, and we are morally certain that a very large proportion of them were absorbed by China and other Asiatic countries. But what proportion thus found their way out of the country can only be conjectured. For the purposes of this argument let us take the estimate of the Director of the Mint as our guide and basis. His estimate is the lowest, and besides it seems to be semi-official. On this basis the monthly purchases of bullion of $2,000,000, as required by the act of 1878, would have to be suspended for four and one-half months. Is this desirable? Does any friend of the standard dollar want this? Is it not the entering-wedge to total demonetization in the near future if the enemies of silver can carry their purpose.

Let no man be deceived into voting for this bill with section 4 in it, simply because it is backed up by a favorable report of the committee. It is replete with hidden dangers. Every member on this floor who is opposed to silver, every member who is in favor of striking down the standard dollar and the closing of the doors of the mints against the further coinage of them, will be found voting to retain this obnoxious section. Watch the roll-call, and you will find every one of them recorded on that side. I especially warn Democrats, who are the friends of silver and of the people, to be careful of the vote they shall give on this important measure.

The other side of the House will be found almost to a man in favor of destroying silver. They never miss an opportunity to degrade it before the country. Section 4 is a direct infringement of the coinage law of 1878. It means that the volume of silver currency shall be decreased to the amount of the trade-dollars found to be outstanding, the lowest estimate of which has been placed at $9,000,000, and it may reach $15,000,000. Are you prepared for this? Is there a demand for it anywhere except that which comes up from the national banks and other monopolists in the East? No one can successfully deny that until within a brief period these trade-dollars have circulated currently among the people everywhere. They have occupied the place of an equal number of standard dollars.

No person having the slightest regard for truth and fair dealing between man and man will attempt to gainsay this proposition. It is a fact of manifest correctness on its face. Now, to treat these trade-dollars as bullion is simply to withdraw and contract the silver currency of the country in any sum ranging from $9,000,000 to $15,000,000. Nothing more, certainly nothing less, can be made out of it. It is equivalent to recalling and recoining from 9,000,000 to 15,000,000 of standard dollars. The trade-dollar is outstanding and has been in active service as a medium of exchange among the people. It is for these reasons, briefly and imperfectly stated, that I am opposed to section 4 of the bill.

This leads me to some further observations on the general question of silver and of silver legislation. I do not propose to treat it as a local question, for it is not. It is a great, broad, national subject, affecting, in my judgment, the best interests of all the people in every section of our common country. Stating it mildly, Mr. Speaker, the attitude of the Government on this subject is wrong. The men of the East who oppose silver as one of the money metals of the land are also radically wrong. To my mind, and I have learned something of the subject by contact and observation, there can be no question about this. The Government ought not to be required to purchase $2,000,000 of bullion or any other sum per month for coinage into standard dollars.

The law of 1878 requiring this is pernicious. The Government does not purchase and coin gold. It should have nothing to do with the ownership of either metal prior to coinage. Both metals should be placed on equal footing and the entire product of both should be minted. The proper function of the Government will have been discharged when it shall have established the ratio. Say, by law, how many grains of silver shall go into the dollar, and stop at that. Then throw your mints open to the free and unlimited coinage of silver and leave the producer to do the rest. It will be his business to get it into circulation after you shall have made it a legal tender for all debts public and private.

This is, I say, the true theory. But the Government is not conducted on correct principles or sound theories, and hence we find a limitation placed on the coinage of silver. The maximum is $4,000,000 and the minimum $2,000,000 per month. As showing the hostility of Republican administrations to silver, the minimum has never been exceeded in any single month since the passage of the law partially remonetizing silver in 1878. What we want is total restoration and full remonetization. We want the entire product of the mines of the West converted into money for the people. If the Government will but go back to the old, sound Democratic policy which was observed and maintained in this country from 1792 down to demonetization by a Republican Congress in 1873, it will have no difficulty and no embarrassments in dealing with this question. Certainly it will not be charged with the duty of hoarding the wealth of the people in its vaults, under the false pretense that silver is unpopular with the masses. You do not give it a chance. Your inventive genius is taxed to the utmost in discovering methods by which you can circumscribe the usefulness of this solid, indestructible money of the people. All of your aims are in that direction. You discredit and depreciate this great source of national wealth on all occasions. The Republican party stands as a menace to the silver currency of the country.

Your President says, in his annual message to Congress, strike it down. Your Secretary of the Treasury says the same thing; and bills without number, all emanating from the Republican side of this House, are pending here looking to the destruction of this metal as a measure of value. We were confronted with similar recommendations and similar attempts at adverse legislation two years ago in the Forty-seventh Congress. The leading newspapers of the East are likewise in chorus. Considering all of these things, and particularly the attitude of the Administration backed up by the dominant party and its press, is it any wonder that the dignity of silver as a money metal seems destined at times to succumb to the clamor? Nothing but the unconquerable will of the American people and their deep reverence for the hard, stable money of the past prevents it. You have swindled the people out of free, unlimited coinage. We shall insist now that you live up to the strict letter of the two-million-per-month-compromise law until you give us something better in its place. Its plain provisions must not be infringed or rendered nugatory in any particular, under any pretext whatever. It was a bad bargain for the people; but I am here to insist on its fulfillment to the letter until you give us something better. For the present, at least, full force and effect must be given to the act of 1878.

Mr. Speaker, from the very dawn of civilization silver has been the money of the people; it has a Biblical record; it goes back to the Abrahamic period: "Abraham was rich in silver and gold;" the high priests and patriarchs and chief scribes of the ancients used it, and to-day it is the money of three-quarters of the people on the globe. True, a few leading nations of the earth have demonetized it, but still, in point of numbers, the people who maintain it as a standard of value are vastly in the majority. When we consider that America is the greatest producer of this metal, can there be any question as to which side the moral support and influence of this Government should be thrown? In my judgment that is an amateur description of statesmanship that would discredit one of the chief products—a chief source of wealth—of our own country.

But let us look for a moment at the history of the silver legislation in this country. Silver was the money of the fathers of the Republic, standard dollars of 412½ grains, 900 fine; and it continued to be the money of the people until our bonded debt and the national banks came into existence. These are the influences that destroyed silver and that are still making war on it through the Republican party, between which there is a close affinity, an alliance offensive and defensive. Trace the legislation. It is intimately associated and blended all along the line. First the bonded debt of the Government was made payable in lawful money of the United States. That was the language of the law on which the bonds were originally issued. Greenbacks came within the category of lawful money. Greenbacks depreciated in the markets of the world. The bondholders and national banks became dissatisfied; they wanted more; they insisted on their pound of flesh from the Government and the people, these men and corporations whose appetites had been sharpened by greed, men given up to avarice, which has been eloquently described as "the most debasing passion in the heavens above, the earth below, or beneath the earth." Then it was that they again approached Congress, through the Republican party, and secured a modification of the original law, making the obligations of the Government payable in coin. Coin at that time meant silver as well as gold. This was a great and beneficent measure, we were told, designed solely to uphold and strengthen the credit of the nation.

Mr. LACEY. If it will not interrupt the gentleman, I would ask whether the act of 1862, which provided for the first issue of greenbacks, did not also provide that the customs dues of the United States should be payable in coin, and that this coin should be set apart as a fund secured for the payment of the public debt; and I would further ask whether the $1,000,000,000 which has been paid on the public debt has not always been paid in pursuance of that sinking-fund act?

Mr. CASSIDY. In reply to my friend from Michigan, I will say that these interrogations do not disturb me at all. I am glad to have them at any point in my remarks. I have no set speech. Regarding the specie fund to which he has alluded, I answer that that was provided to meet the accruing interest on the public debt.

Mr. LACEY. No; the interest and the principal.

Mr. CASSIDY. I beg the gentleman's pardon. None of the bonds matured for many years, and this specie reserve was provided exclusively to meet the interest. But the point is immaterial. Whatever may have been the early policy, we have long since abandoned it.

Mr. BRUMM. Subsequent legislation brought in the principal.

Mr. CASSIDY. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania is right. But that is a matter of legislative history which is not material as affecting the general line of my argument.

But let us go back; let us not lose sight of the distinguished consideration with which the Government treated a certain class of its creditors. I had shown how the lawful greenback had been relegated to a back seat in the interest of and at the bidding of the bondholder. He had arranged to have his holdings liquidated in hard coin, and reasonably he should have been happy and content. But this blissful state was not destined to be of long duration. He thirsted for gold, and gold alone; silver would not satisfy his craving, nor would the two metals together suffice to drive him from the doors of this Hall. Then, at his instance, came the law of 1873, enacted by another Republican Congress, striking down at a single blow the silver of the country and driving it from the field in disgrace as one of the money metals of the land And what was the result? Mark well the effect. There was immediately preciptated such a panic, such widespread suffering and disaster, as had never been witnessed before in this country. Utter stagnation and financial ruin, universal and all-pervading, characterized every section of the land. Values, confidence, credit, all were swept away in a day, and for the first time in our history, be it remembered, the "tramp" made his appearance among us. Gentlemen may not be able to trace the connection between demonetization and the inauguration of the "tramp" era, but I call attention to the fact that by a remarkable coincidence they are of even date. The depression which hung like a pall over the country and every material interest thereof from 1873 to 1878 is known of all men. Perhaps the demonetization of silver did not produce this unhappy state of affairs, but the circumstance is at least significant and supplies its lesson.

Mr. BELFORD. May I ask the gentleman from Nevada if it is not a fact that Germany, after the discovery of gold in California, absolutely demonetized gold in the interest of the Rothschilds?

Mr. CASSIDY. I believe the gentleman from Colorado is correct. I have seen it so stated, though I have nothing authentic on the subject. There can be no question that Germany at once proceeded to dishonor silver when she saw that we were producing it in large quantities.

But let me not be diverted from my purpose to draw another lesson from the more recent legislation on the subject of silver. It is patent to all that a Democratic Congress partially restored silver to its old place in 1878, an act which was immediately followed by a period of unparalleled and unexampled progress and prosperity throughout every portion of our common country. Nay, more, specie resumption, in my judgment and in the judgment of many able financiers, was alone rendered possible through remonetization and the restoration of silver. In the face of these indisputable facts of history, who can say that this money of the people is not entitled to the fullest and fairest consideration at the hands of all men who seek to advance the public weal. We know that demonetization in 1873 was succeeded by universal distress, while general prosperity followed remonetization in 1878. The statesman who is honestly striving to solve this question correctly can not and will not ignore the effect produced by these acts respectively.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that three-quarters of the people of the world use silver exclusively. Less than 15 per cent. of the people of the habitable globe employ the single gold standard. The average relative value of the two metals for two hundred years prior to demonetization in the United States in 1873 was less than 3 per cent. It has sometimes reached 5 per cent. since 1873, all owing to the false attitude in which the United States had been placed on the subject. The countries which use gold only as a standard of value are Great Britain, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Portugal, Turkey, Canada, Brazil, Argentine Republic, Persia, Cape of Good Hope, and the Australian colonies, with an aggregate population of 138,600,000. Those which use silver only as a standard of value are Russia, Austria, Mexico, Central America, Ecuador, Peru, China, British India, Siam, Burmah, Dutch colonies of Java, Madeira, Egypt, Tunis, and Tripoli, with an aggregate population of 772,000,000. Those using both gold and silver and having the double standard are France, Belgium, Switzerland, Italy, Greece, Roumania, Holland, Spain, United States, Colombia, Venezuela, Chili, Uruguay, Paraguay, Bolivia, Cuba, and Algiers, with an aggregate population of 181,100,000. The population who use gold alone as a standard and those who use silver alone as a standard and those who use both are divided as follows:

| Standards. | Population. | Per cent. |
|---|---|---|
| Gold | 138,600,000 | 13 |
| Silver | 772,000,000 | 71 |
| Gold and silver | 181,100,000 | 16 |
| Total | 1,091,700,000 | 100 |

This table embraces forty-five countries of the commercial world, and about all that are of any consequence in the consideration of this subject.

The Westminster Review and the Journal des Economistes, both eminent authorities, estimate that the annual product of gold and silver throughout the world is less than $200,000,000. Soetbeer and other distinguished economists and writers claim that $60,000,000 of gold and $28,000,000 of silver are annually consumed in the arts and manufactures. The accidents of life, abrasion of coin, waste, and burials it is estimated will consume $30,000,000 more, making a grand total of $118,000,000, and reducing the annual net increase in all the world to about $80,000,000, an insignificant sum compared with the demands of a rapidly expanding commerce and a growing population. In this country in particular the maximum of production of the precious metals has long since been reached and passed. The flush bonanza days have gone, never to return.

It is true that we will continue to produce for generations to come anywhere from $25,000,000 to $75,000,000 per annum, but there is no likelihood that we shall ever again reach the enormous figures of a few years ago. Hence it is to be said that not the slightest apprehension need be felt that there will ever again be an abnormal production of the precious metals in this country. It is a theme of serious regret, in my opinion, that this important product is slowly but surely tending in the other direction. And do gentlemen know that when they strike a blow at silver they also cripple the production of gold? We cannot mine for gold alone. In pretty much all of the ores of the West the two metals are held in combination in about equal parts. You cannot strike down one without injuring the other. Neither is silver an incident of gold mining. In all of the lower-grade mines (and the low grades are the rule and at the same time the more valuable and permanent) it takes both metals to yield a profit, and that too with silver in good demand and at a fair price. Whenever you do anything here which discredits and depreciates silver, bear in mind that by the same act you discourage the production of gold, a metal which you all assume to hold in the highest and holiest esteem.

I had not intended, Mr. Speaker, to discuss the general subject of silver, but I find so many bills and substitutes pending before the House that I can see no way open to me but to meet the whole question upon its merits.

Let us now turn for a moment to the operations of the Treasury since silver was restored in 1878. Let us see whether we have been benefited or injured by the law of that date.

The total volume of money in this country may be set down at (I deal in round figures) $700,000,000 in paper, $500,000,000 in gold, and $250,000,000 in silver. At the date of remonetization and specie resumption there was less than $300,000,000 of gold, and comparatively but a nominal sum in silver in this country. The Treasury was practically destitute of both metals. The Secretary was authorized to sell $100,000,000 of bonds for gold to make ready for and to maintain specie resumption. To-day he has more gold than he knows what to do with; the vaults are absolutely overflowing, and one of the serious problems confronting this Congress is what to do or how to dispose of the surplus. Was there ever anything like it known before in the history of governments? A surplus of gold of more than $100,000,000 for which the Government can find no immediate use. Think of it. And in the mean time we have coined and placed in the Treasury 166,125,119 standard dollars, on ninety-six million and odd of which silver certificates have been issued, thus placing in circulation among the people approximately $150,000,000 in coin and paper without in any manner disturbing the gold reserve. Could anything be more satisfactory or furnish a more complete refutation of the senseless gabble that the standard dollars would inevitably drive all of the gold out of the Treasury? More than this, Mr. Speaker, we have been told for years that silver would drive all of the gold not alone out of the Treasury but out of the country as well. Have any of these gloomy predictions and prophecies come true? Let us look into this matter briefly and see how it stands. I have here a little table, prepared with great care, which tells the whole story. It shows the movements of these metals from the first year after remonetization down to the present time. It is a most potent and eloquent argument in behalf of silver, and gentlemen will do me a great favor by giving special attention to the figures. The more I study this table the more I become convinced that the single-standard advocates are unsafe financial doctors and should never again be allowed to interfere with the patient.

Value of gold and silver imported into and exported from the United States from 1879 to 1883, inclusive.

| Year ended June 30— | Exports. | | Imports. | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| | Gold. | Silver. | Gold. | Silver. |
| 1879 | $4,587,614 | $20,409,827 | $5,624,948 | $4,587,614 |
| 1880 | 3,639,025 | 13,503,894 | 80,758,396 | 12,275,914 |
| 1881 | 2,565,132 | 16,841,715 | 100,031,259 | 10,544,238 |
| 1882 | 32,587,880 | 16,829,599 | 34,377,054 | 8,095,336 |
| 1883 | 11,600,888 | 20,219,445 | 17,734,149 | 10,755,242 |
| Total for five years | 54,980,539 | 87,804,480 | 238,525,806 | 46,258,344 |

This covers the exports and imports for five years. The argument is absolutely unanswerable. I will not detain the House to analyze the table in detail or by years. It speaks for itself both in detail and as a whole. But let us contemplate the aggregates for the five years for a moment. Dropping the odd figures, we exported $54,000,000 of gold and $87,000,000 of silver, over $30,000,000 more of silver than of gold, which is not a bad showing when we consider that the silver was to chase all of the gold out of the country. But the figures for the other direction are even more significant; our imports can not fail to confound those who have predicted dire disaster from the rehabilitation of the standard dollar.

Ponder well the astounding facts and see what becomes of all of your adverse criticism. For the five years our imports of gold were $238,000,000, while we brought to this country from all sources and directions but $46,000,000 in silver, a clear excess of $192,000,000 in favor of the importation of gold. Is anything further wanted? Where are the prophets of evil and darkness and disaster? Who can repeat that through remonetization we are destined to attract the silver of the Old World and at the same time lose our gold? Where can there be found a single adverse circumstance on which to predicate a doubt? Point it out in all the length and breadth of this question if you can. It does not exist anywhere. Our position, backed up as it is by the demonstrated facts, is simply impregnable.

All the talk and bluster about European silver finding its way hither is the supremest nonsense. I am astonished that any man of ordinary intelligence—the most ordinary—should seriously put forth such an argument. All European coins are debased; they are not equal to ours either in weight or fineness. There is also a marked difference in the ratio. The ratio everywhere in the old country is as 15½ to 1, while ours is 16 to 1. At home they circulate at par with gold, while here they would rank below our standard silver. No foreign coin can come here and enter the field side by side with our silver without sustaining a loss of from 3 to 4 per cent. in depreciation, to say nothing of the cost of exchange and transportation. This is enough to keep them out for all time. A very moderate tariff would successfully exclude foreign silver bullion if there was any disposition for it to flow in this direction, which there is not. Less duty would protect us from any real or imaginary danger from this cause than is imposed for the benefit of pig-iron. But regarding silver bullion as a valuable asset and great source of wealth as I do, I would not place any restrictions whatever upon it. Having first shown that it was impossible for the foreign coins to enter this country, I merely suggest a way to control the influx of foreign bullion, should it be absurdly concluded that we were attracting too much of it. But enough on this point; the figures given and the deductions made are more than conclusive of this branch of the case.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct the attention of the House to another distressing aspect of this subject. There are those who affect to be seized with great terror and alarm the moment the current of trade turns against us. All such persons have my profoundest sympathy. But what are we going to do about it? In what respect does silver affect the case? Oh, but gentlemen say yonder pile of silver in the Treasury is driving all of the gold out of the country. How?

When we say that the balance of trade is against us we mean that we have bought more from foreign countries than we have sold to them. Under existing rules the balances between nations are payable in gold coin. We have lately been called upon to export some $13,000,000 to make good our balances. Our high war tariff is operating to exclude the products of the leading nations from our markets, and by way of retaliation Germany and France discriminate against American pork, and England through her quarantine regulations is excluding our cattle. The latter, for another reason which I shall give in a moment, is also looking elsewhere for her breadstuffs.

For these, and perhaps other reasons, the balance of trade is temporarily against us, and the difference in accounts must be met and paid in gold. That is the status of the case as we find it to-day. Now, for the purposes of this argument, let us suppose that there is not a dollar of silver in the Treasury or among the people. Or dump, if you will, yonder bulk of standard dollars into the bottom of the Potomac. Would you be any better off? Could the situation be thus improved? Would you not have to send out your gold balance then as now? In what way, or sense, or degree, or direction, may I ask in all fairness, does silver affect the question? Blot it all out, if you please, and still you must pay your debt in gold. Can any man under the sun, in this House or out of it, give me a single logical reason why we should destroy our silver, simply because we are required to meet a gold obligation with gold? And yet this is precisely what we are asked to do. I have too much faith in the sound practical sense of the great mass of the American people to believe that they will ever permit it to be done.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to interrupt the gentleman just here, since he has alluded, during the course of his remarks, to a question that was asked on yesterday with reference to the coming to this country of European silver, and I wish, with his permission, to answer as I did then, that the circulation of silver in Europe is strictly on a par with gold. This is the case in Great Britain, in Germany, and in France, as well as in some of the other countries of Europe. Silver is on a par with gold; and so it is here, and it is at a par with gold there on a ratio of 15½; that is to say that one ounce of gold in Europe is worth 15½ ounces of silver, while here it is worth 1 to 16, and we lose consequently half an ounce in value on every 15½ ounces of silver.

Mr. CASSIDY. Precisely so. I have said that in substance. I thought I had made myself clear on that point.

Mr. BLAND. In other words, we pay 16 ounces of silver for 1 ounce of gold, when in Europe they pay only 15½ ounces of silver for 1 ounce of gold; consequently silver is worth more there than it is here.

Mr. CASSIDY. I thought I had argued out that whole proposition. I tried to demonstrate that it would be impossible for the Old World to unload its silver upon us for the same reason which the distinguished gentleman from Missouri has so clearly set forth. No man who understands the question will attempt to dispute the soundness of this position. I thank my friend for the interruption. The author of the standard dollar, he is always right on every phase of the silver question.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is abundant evidence to show that vast numbers of our own people place quite as high an estimate on silver as on gold. If the vaults of your Treasury are to-day overflowing with gold it is because it was brought there by exchanging silver for it. The Secretary of the Treasury tells us in his annual report that he purchased $96,000,000 of gold with $96,000,000 of silver certificates, the operation being confined to a single subtreasury. Do these operations indicate any want of confidence in silver on the part of the people? Do they not show that the people prefer silver to gold? Those who parted with their gold for silver certificates did so understandingly. They knew that the silver certificates, for which they paid gold, were redeemable alone in silver.

Who, then, has a right to assume that gold is held in higher esteem than standard silver or the paper based thereon? Where is the evidence of it? On the contrary, does not the transfer of $96,000,000 of gold for $96,000,000 of silver, dollar for dollar, even up, and no grumbling, stand out as an irrefutable answer to all of your clamor about the disfavor with which the people view the standard dollar? The truth is, and the whole truth, that you are constantly misleading the public with reference to the accumulation of silver in the coffers of the nation. Despite your assertions, the Government owns to-day less than $40,000,000 of all the standard dollars locked up in the Treasury. The people paid gold for them, or what is equivalent, for the silver certificates which they represent, and as a consequence the Government has parted with its ownership—the ownership thus vesting in the people. In every calculation, therefore, it is but simply fair to treat this $96 000,000. held for the redemption of an equal amount of silver certificates, as being in active circulation among the people. It is the same as though it were not in the Treasury at all, and should be estimated accordingly. I have here the official statement, which, however, I shall not take the time of the House to read, showing all of these transactions as I have represented them.

And now, sir, this brings me to a very brief consideration of the superiority of the silver certificate over any other form of paper money in use in this country save the gold certificate. It is vastly superior to any and every variety and description of paper money based on the mere ability of the Government to pay, based on your credit, or on your debts. I have no hesitancy in declaring that silver certificates are the best and safest form of paper money that this country ever knew. Every dollar of them has something tangible, something with intrinsic value behind it. All other forms are predicated on the faith and credit of the nation. The greenbacks are in that condition, and so are the notes of the national banks. And just here will some gentleman kindly tell me wherein a national-bank note is better than an ordinary greenback?

The bank note is based on the Government bond, and in turn the bond rests on the credit of the Government. So does the greenback. It is all credit; it is all debt. The system may work well enough in a time of profound peace when everything is running smoothly, but I warn gentlemen that it will not stand the strain of a panic caused by war or other national disaster. Turn with me, if you please, to the financial history of the Government during the late war. Go to the darker days of that mighty struggle and see the ruin produced by a depreciated currency—United States bonds, greenbacks, all rating below zero both at home and abroad.

Why, sir, at a certain period of the war it required two hundred and sixty-six paper dollars of the Government to buy one hundred of the standard dollars that we have just been talking about. For a whole year greenbacks were worth but 40 cents on the dollar as compared with silver, and it has not been seven years since silver bore a premium everywhere in this country. And, as I have just stated, there was a time when one hundred standard dollars possessed the purchasing power of two hundred and sixty-six of these Government promises to pay. Any considerable depreciation of paper based on a coin foundation is simply an impossibility.

Take, for example, our silver certificates, which I claim to be the best paper money the world has ever known. The bitterest enemy of silver will hardly deny that there is 88 cents of intrinsic value behind every dollar of them, measured by the London market for raw, uncoined bullion; and London fixes the bullion market of the world. The use to which the standard dollar is put, the legal-tender power with which it is clothed, and the devices and inscriptions stamped upon it should certainly impart to it something in addition and above its intrinsic bullion value, making it, as we claim, worth full 100 cents. But decry it and degrade it all you can, at the very worst it must always be worth intrinsically about 90 cents. With the Government in trouble the tendency would inevitably be toward appreciation. So it transpires that under the most inauspicious circumstances the silver certificate can never depreciate more than about 10 per cent., while we have all seen the promises of the Government, the greenback, go down 60 per cent. As a safe, stable medium of exchange can there be any comparison between the two systems or any doubt as to which is the better? Your credit system may be passably satisfactory in peace; it is utterly unsound and unreliable in war.

And in this connection let me remind gentlemen on this side of the House that the old Democratic doctrine used to be hard money for the people and opposition to national banks. There is to-day a scarcity of silver everywhere in this country, simply because your coinage laws are not properly and fairly administered. The shinplaster currency is another bar to the circulation of silver. I would instantly strike down every law providing for the issue of bank bills of a lower denomination than $5. Repeal the laws authorizing the one and two dollar bills, and in one month there will not be a silver dollar left in the Treasury. In the very nature of things the last dollar would be required to make change among the people. On the Pacific coast we have always dealt exclusively in gold and silver; all of our transactions have been conducted on a hard-money basis, treating all paper money as a commodity; and I can assure gentlemen that nothing would induce us to abandon it for the system prevailing among our brethren of the East. I can well understand that custom, having the force of education, has much to do with popularizing a particular species of money with a people. The constant use of paper by the people of the East for twenty-odd years has engendered an ill-founded hostility to metallic money. Time alone, I fear, can bring you back to sound principles.

I will not be claiming too much, Mr. Speaker, when I assert that the product of the precious metals in this country is intimately associated and blended with the best interests of the whole people. Go back in imagination thirty-five years and see the condition of this country prior to the discovery of the precious metals on the Pacific coast. Then follow along down the years and see what gigantic strides have been made in advancing and developing every material interest of the people. Witness the resistless march and ever-onward tread of empire toward the setting sun. See the railway and the telegraph stretching from ocean to ocean, and behold the advance everywhere made in the arts, sciences, and manufactures, lifting up the whole plane of human comforts and human enjoyments many degrees in this country. Where one used to have the good things of this life thousands have them now. Why, sir, the last thirty-five years has seen the world moved ahead in Christian civilization further than in any five centuries before since the stars sang together, and all this since the outpouring of gold and silver in the West. We have created new impulses and enlarged demands for the products of all of your industries. Mining for the precious metals is a higher type of industry than any other followed by mortal man. Besides lying at the very foundation of all progress, all prosperity, it awakens hopes and aspirations that can never be realized in any other pursuit.

It has been said by some one that he who causes a blade of grass to grow where none grew before is a benefactor. So he is; and he who mines for the precious metals and adds thereby to the wealth of the world is also a public benefactor, because there can be no wealth without production. All else is mere barter and exchange and interchange. And here again the superiority of our product asserts itself. It represents stable, solid, indestructible wealth, while the products of all other industries are ephemeral and perishable. The wheat and corn and blades of grass of the agriculturist may decay, but the wealth produced by the miner is indestructible and imperishable. No matter if it costs $2 in mining to produce one, which it does not, mining with proper prudence being as safe and legitimate as any other pursuit, the $2, going out among the people, have not been lost, and another has been added to the general stock and wealth of the world.

So I might go on, Mr. Speaker, ad infinitum, demonstrating that the welfare and prosperity of the whole people in every part of this Union are directly promoted by the production of the precious metals on the Pacific coast. In this view the question becomes one of greater breadth and depth than gentlemen on this floor have seemed to realize. Although representing a State which has produced a greater amount of the precious metals than any other section of equal extent on the face of the earth, I make no appeal from a local point of view. As I said in the beginning, I regard this as a great broad national question, affecting directly and immeasurably the material advancement of all the people in every section. Why, Mr. Speaker, can it be doubted that the agriculturist, the farmer of the great Northwest, is as much interested in maintaining and upholding the dignity of silver as the miner himself who produces it?

Let me illustrate; let me show the House in what manner and to what extent he is interested. England is the chief market for our agricultural products, and England usually buys where she can buy cheapest. India is a silver-using country, and a silver dollar there will go as far in the purchase of wheat and corn as a gold dollar here. No one will dispute that. Does it not follow, then, as a natural sequence that the more we discredit and dishonor silver the greater the inducement we offer for the Englishman to purchase his food supply, his breadstuffs from India in exchange for a metal which we ourselves have aided him to degrade and depreciate? The 5 or 10 per cent. advantage in the transaction is not a thing to be ignored by the thrifty Briton, and I say to gentlemen here and now that this is an important factor in that condition of affairs which is to-day turning the balance of trade against us. By discrediting and discounting our silver we lose a market for our agricultural products amounting to hundreds of millions annually. Is this not a proposition too plain to need elucidation?

This, Mr. Speaker, is a great economic question, a live question of the hour, when wheat is a drug at 80 cents in Chicago and Milwaukee, and is everywhere in the Northwest rotting in the bins of the farmers, with no outlet and no market for it in any direction or at any price. Under this state of the case, where is the man on this floor who by his attitude on this question can stab his country's welfare and best interest in so vital a part and thereafter muster the temerity to look an honest, intelligent constituency squarely in the face. Not the Pacific coast States, not Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Illinois, or the other great grain-producing States of the Northwest are alone interested in this question, but all of your States, North and South, should be enthusiastic supporters of that policy which would insure a favorable market for our surplus agricultural and manufactured products, thereby attracting to our shores the gold of foreign countries in exchange for them, to enter into and quicken the pulse of all the channels of business and enterprise and shedding beneficence and prosperity throughout the length and breadth of our common country. And thus it is, Mr. Speaker, that I reach the conclusion that to strike at silver is to aim a blow at the prosperity of the whole people.

With the question fully and rightly understood, where should there be found anywhere in this country the man opposing silver to its overthrow and ultimate destruction as one of the money metals? We know that this solid money of the people is meeting with implacable and relentless hostility at every step. Where, then, does it come from? I answer most unhesitatingly, from the national banks, those soulless pets of the Government and the Republican party, which have grown great enough and certainly arrogant enough to dictate the financial policy of this country. Examine the legislative history, examine the votes and the roll-calls, and every unbiased mind must become convinced that the Republican party is in league with the national banks to destroy silver.

That grandest of heroes, President Jackson, becoming alarmed at the encroachments of one national bank, representing a capital of less than $35,000,000, struck it down, and the American people enthusiastically indorsed him for the act. In vetoing the national-bank bill President Jackson used this language, which should be treasured in the heart of every true patriot:

> It is to be regretted that the rich and powerful too often bend the acts of government to their selfish purposes. Distinctions in society will always exist under every just government. Equality of talents, of education, or of wealth can not be produced by human institutions. In the full enjoyment of the gifts of Heaven and the fruits of superior industry, economy, and virtue every man is equally entitled to protection by law. But when the laws undertake to add to these natural and just advantages artificial distinctions, to grant titles, gratuities, and exclusive privileges; to make the rich richer and the potent more powerful, the humble members of society, the farmers, mechanics, and laborers, who have neither the time nor the means of securing like favors to themselves, have a right to complain of the injustice of their government. There are no necessary evils in government. Its evils exist only in its abuses. If it would confine itself to equal protection and, as Heaven does its rains, shower its favor alike on the high and low, the rich and the poor, it would be an unqualified blessing. In the act before me there seems to be a wide and unnecessary departure from these just principles.
> Nor is our Government to be maintained or our Union preserved by invasions of the rights and powers of the several States. In thus attempting to make our General Government strong, we make it weak. It is true strength consists in leaving individuals and States as much as possible to themselves, in making itself felt, not in its power, but in its beneficence; not in its control, but in its protection; not in binding the States more closely to the center, but leaving each to move unobstructed in its proper orbit.
> Experience should teach us wisdom. Most of the difficulties our Government now encounters and most of the dangers which impend over our Union have sprung from an abandonment of the legitimate objects of government by our National Legislature and the adoption of such principles as are embodied in this act. Many of our rich men have not been content with equal protection and equal benefits, but have besought us to make them richer by acts of Congress. By attempting to gratify their desire we have, in the results of our legislation, arrayed section against section, interest against interest, and man against man in a fearful commotion which threatens to shake the foundations of our Union. It is time to pause in our career, to review our principles, and if possible to revive that devoted patriotism and spirit of compromise which distinguished the sages of the Revolution and the fathers of our Union. If we can not at once, in justice to interests vested under improvident legislation, make our Government what it ought to be, we can at least take a stand against all new grants of monopolies and exclusive privileges, against any prostitution of our Government to the advancement of the few at the expense of the many, and in favor of compromise and gradual reform in our code of laws and systems of political economy.

That is the doctrine, Mr. Speaker. Equal rights to all men; special privileges to none. But what would Jackson think of two thousand and odd of the institutions against which he inveighed, with an aggregate capital of more than $600,000,000, possessing the attribute of sovereignty to the extent of fixing and controlling the volume of the people's money, with the power to contract or expand it at will, which carries with it, necessarily, the further power to destroy or inflate all values with equal facility. Monstrous doctrine and tremendous power, one which should not be parted with by the Government, even though it were delegated to a saint from Heaven! The right to regulate a people's money is the special province of government, and this power should not be abdicated in favor of any mortal man or set of men, corporate or otherwise, under the sun. To say nothing of the dangerous power exercised by these banks, their franchise and special privileges in the past have constituted the most valuable grant on earth. Based on Government bonds, bearing interest in gold payable semi-annually, and free from taxation, their profits have been, and are still, enormous. But their profits are not so objectionable as their political power; the power to throttle the Government at will and compel it to do their bidding. On every important measure their influence is felt at both ends of this Capitol, and always on the side of monopoly and aggregated wealth. In the last Congress an iniquitous tariff law was enacted, simply because it carried a clause relieving the banks of $12,000,000 in income tax. And so it has been, and so it always will be while we maintain this system, and greed and avarice find lodgment in the human heart.

It is not difficult, Mr. Speaker, to understand why the Republican party is for the national banks. It unquestionably proceeds from the fact that the national banks are for the Republican party. It is a close alliance, as I said a moment ago, offensive and defensive. The President is with them, as he has frankly told you in his annual message, and the Secretary of the Treasury is with them, as he has exhibited by indorsing his recommendation of two years ago. Give me your attention while I read what he says. Here it is:

There need be no apprehension of a too limited paper circulation. The national banks are ready to issue their notes in such quantity as the laws of trade demand, and as security therefor the Government will hold an equivalent in its own bonds.

The embarrassments which are certain to follow from the endeavor to maintain several standards of value, in the form of paper currency, are too obvious to need discussion.

It is recommended, therefore, that measures be taken for a repeal of the act requiring the issue of silver certificates, and the early retirement of them from circulation.

As is said elsewhere herein, the circulation of some sixty-six millions of silver certificates seems an inexpedient addition to the paper currency. They are made a legal tender for the purposes named, yet have for their basis about 88 per cent. only of their nominal value. There is no promise from the Government to make good the difference between their actual and nominal value.

There we have it, Mr. Speaker; the whole administration moving as one man in favor of the national banks and against silver, the dominant idea being to drive silver from the monetary field and leave the banks in undisputed possession to shape the currency of the people. I may not be exactly authentic in all I say, but I am terribly in earnest on the main proposition and for the rights of the people. In this connection I desire to send to the Clerk's desk to be read an article from my own paper, the Eureka Daily Sentinel, which states the case under consideration fully and succinctly, as follows:

Legislation respecting the Government bonds has been a series of enactments to increase the value of those bonds. Some of them were sold for a depreciated currency, and many of them were to be paid in lawful money. Silver was lawful money and the bonds were made payable in gold only to enhance their value. Then to make gold more valuable silver was demonetized. In almost every session of Congress since the war we have had some legislation to enhance the value of gold and bonds. Sometimes this legislation was had under one false pretense and sometimes under another. Under the pretense of paying our honest debts in honest money, the bonds that were sold for less than 50 cents on the dollar were made payable in gold. Silver was surreptitiously demonetized and resumption of specie payments was enforced on a gold basis. This legislation added fully 20 per cent. to the value of a large portion of the Government bonds and half as much to the value of gold. This whole series of legislation was simply a series of legalized stock-gambling and gold-board operations in gold and silver, the same speculators acting as bulls for one metal and bears for the other, always raising gold and depressing silver. And yet those of us who oppose this unjust legislation and object to having it continued, who object to being compelled to pay more than we contract to pay, and who object to having the profits of our mines destroyed by further unfriendly legislation, are, forsooth, "silver lunatics" and "swindlers."

And why should the national banks be against silver, as I claim they are, backed up, too, by all of the Republican administrations since the first term of Grant down to the present time? No one will deny that Hayes vetoed the 3½ per cent. funding act at the instance of the banks. But Hayes was a nobody, and his shortcomings need not be charged up against the Republican party. Two-thirds of them would spew him out to-day were the alternative presented to them, except on questions affecting the old Whig doctrine of national banks and opposition to silver. On these questions they are true to their antecedents and the banks.

And why, Mr. Speaker, as I inquired a moment ago, should the national banks be inimical to silver and the silver interest? That is a very simple proposition. The nearer they can have the field to themselves the better it is for them. An eminent political economist states the case forcibly and better than I can, in these words:

The more you reduce the volume of the money of the world, as by demonetizing silver and the paper based thereon, the more you increase the purchasing power of the remaining money, gold and the notes based thereon, and, other things being equal and unchanged, proportionately depress prices of industrial and commercial values and commodities, reduce rents, profits, and wages, thus impoverishing investors and bankrupting debtors.

Now, Mr. Speaker, everybody can understand the force of that paragraph, and I am about done with the whole question. I only regret that I had not made preparation to present the case more elaborately on its merits, for it is a just and an inspiring theme. The reason why the national banks are interested in discrediting and degrading the silver of the country is quite apparent; they want to control the entire monetary field.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am not unmindful that the public interest-bearing debt of the Government must be paid. There is no determination more fixed in the minds of the American people than that the last vestige of interest-bearing debt shall be wiped out of existence as fast as the revenues of the country and its resources will permit. Herein lies the chief hope of the American people. With the extinguishment of the public debt the banks must go and other forms of money come to the front. That will be a proud day for silver when the last national bank shall have surrendered its charter. With this accomplished, if it ever is, the money of the future will be gold and gold certificates, silver and silver certificates, and United States Treasury notes. At that period, yonder pile of silver in the Treasury will become an important factor in our national financial system. When that day shall have arrived, which must arrive within the next quarter of a century if we keep faith, our silver reserve will be found a great source of wealth and comfort and strength to the monetary system of the Republic.

And now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion allow me to say that I am not a communist; that I do not oppose capital for the sake of opposition, but am willing to give it a fair and an even chance in every avenue of life; that I am not against the national banks because they contain so large a share of the aggregate wealth of the country, but because of the abuse of the extraordinary power conferred erroneously upon them; but I am opposed now and forever, irrevocably and eternally, to any system and all systems which are calculated to enrich the few at the expense of the many, and which, while under the specious pretext of affording protection to the capital of the country, would strike down our constitutional Union and usurp the liberties of the people. [Great applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nevada has twenty-two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. CASSIDY. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD].

Mr. BELFORD. I do not take any ten minutes. I am a member of the committee and am entitled to an hour in my own right. I will wait and take my own time.

Mr. CASSIDY. Very well. I tried to be as kind to my friend as I could. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nevada, as the Chair understands, has been speaking in the time of the gentleman from California [Mr. TULLY].

Mr. CASSIDY. The gentleman from California yielded his whole time to me.

Mr. BELFORD. I appreciate the kindness of my friend from Nevada, but I desire to say that I represent the greatest silver-producing State of this nation; and when I contemplate this bill, with all its pregnant dangers, I do not propose to present the question to this House in ten minutes. Therefore, as a member of the committee, I desire to have an hour in my own right, although I do not expect to occupy over twenty-five minutes.

The SPEAKER. According to the list furnished to the Chair, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] would be next entitled to the floor. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Rhode Island next after the gentleman from Colorado. The gentleman from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. BELFORD. One of the great and supereminent causes that led to the adoption of the Federal Constitution was to secure a uniformity of our coinage. Any man who has studied the history of his country will appreciate that fact. I am in favor of three sections of this bill upon that principle of procuring a uniformity of the coinage. I am opposed to the fourth section because it is a covered fraud upon the people of this nation.

You may say, because I represent a silver State, that this opposition on my part springs from personal interest. But it is not so, and I propose to demonstrate that fact to this House. In 1849 when gold was discovered in California the Rothschilds sent a commission to America, because they were afraid that bullion would become too cheap and they had invested their bonds. They went over to the German Parliament and required that Parliament to demonetize gold. That is a truth of history. Afterward, when silver got cheap, in order to advance the value of their bonds they went to that same Parliament and demanded that it should demonetize silver. In both instances they carried out their purpose. Their object was to make their bonds valuable when gold was cheap and to make their bonds valuable when silver was cheap. And I appeal to my Democratic friends on the other side of the House whether they are going to vote for a bill that in my judgment is in the interest of the Rothschilds, who control Germany on the question of gold demonetization and also on the question of silver demonetization. This is a question not appertaining to Colorado but appertaining to the entire nation, and I sincerely hope that the good sense and sound judgment of my Democratic friends will not allow this bill to pass unless they strike out the fourth section.

Let me request the attention of you Southern men. You are the men I want to talk to. Look at this Government up here. Of what material is it composed? We have west of the Alleghany Mountains 35,000,000 of people, three-fifths of the population of this nation. You have a President from New York, have you not? You have a Secretary from New York, have you not? You have that President sending to the Senate and to this House a message advocating the demonetization of silver, and I will come to the reason why he does that thing before I get through.

Mr. RANNEY. Did the President recommend demonetization of silver?

Mr. BELFORD. Yes, he recommended practically demonetization of silver, my dear friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. RANNEY. When?

Mr. BELFORD. Why, at the last Congress; and you read the message, if you were as diligent as you usually are.

Here we have a President from the State of New York recommending the demonetization of silver; and here we have a Secretary of the Treasury from the State of New York making the same recommendation. We also have a Secretary of the Navy from the State of New Hampshire. Of the population of this country two-fifths only reside east of the Alleghany Mountains, and three-fifths reside on the other side of the Alleghanies. Yet not one of that three-fifths of the population of this country is intrusted with any duty in connection with the great financial interests of the country.

And here is my venerable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], who for years I have revered and respected. After he had gone to Germany and consulted with that brutal tyrant, Bismarck, he comes back here and advocates practically the cessation of the coinage of silver.

Mr. KELLEY. I beg leave to say to the gentleman that I am not conscious of having been in Germany. I did in my weakness stretch my travels as far as Paris, where I spent three weeks, but had not the privilege of seeing many German statesmen there.

Mr. BELFORD. This House will recollect, because I read them with pleasure, a series of letters which that gentleman wrote after he had had a brilliant interview with Prince Bismarck.

Mr. KELLEY. When?

Mr. BELFORD. Two years ago, I think it was.

Mr. KELLEY. If I remember rightly it was five years ago.

Mr. BELFORD. Oh, no!

Mr. KELLEY. Yes; that is, if my arithmetic sustains me upon the basis of 1879 from 1884.

Mr. BELFORD. The gentleman's arithmetic might sustain him on the question of when he wrote the pamphlet, but when it was produced, in my judgment, was the last Congress.

Mr. KELLEY. I am talking about the alleged interview with Bismarck, which occurred five years ago.

Mr. BELFORD. Very well; let us get to another point. [Great laughter.] I say that when the gentleman came back from Europe this last fall, with his improved health, for which we should all be grateful, he introduced a bill into this House to stop the coinage of silver. He is willing to stand up here and advocate day after day the protection of pig-iron, is he not? Do not we all know that?

Mr. KELLEY. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. BELFORD. You can go right along, it will not disturb me at all.

Mr. KELLEY. I know the gentleman's candor would prevent him from misrepresenting a friend.

Mr. BELFORD. I would not do it for the world.

Mr. KELLEY. My desire is to promote the world-wide use of silver on its ancient basis; and my bill is one which I believe to be well calculated to force arrogant England, the persecutor of silver and silver-using nations, to sue for relief from her own arrogance by asking for the remonetization of silver on this ancient basis, and that is the object to which I aim.

Mr. BELFORD. Why did not the gentleman introduce a bill to protect arrogant England on the subject of pig-iron? [Great laughter.] The gentleman from Pensylvania stands here and asks us people from the West to protect pig-iron, and I have voted to do it. New Jersey stands here and asks me to protect her silk interests. Connecticut says to me, "I want you to vote to protect my cutlery interests;" and Louisiana says, "I want you to vote to protect my sugar interests;" and I have always voted in that direction. Yet there is a settled, studied policy on the part of the monopolists of the East to discredit and injure and ruin the great industry of my State.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman whether any of these monopolists failed to stand by him for the duties he demanded for the lead of Colorado—an industry scarcely second to her silver? And I want to know if they failed to protect her pig-iron, nail factories, and Bessemer rail mills?

Mr. BELFORD. I am glad the gentleman has asked me that question. I can tell him that Colorado needs no tariff on Bessemer steel. It costs $14 to ship a ton of Bessemer steel rails from the State of Pennsylvania to the State of Colorado. All the tariff that is there needed is the distance which the rails have to be conveyed. And yet, absolutely knowing and recognizing this fact, I have generously stood up to protect the men in your State who have not shown through you the generosity which should have been displayed. That is what I say upon that subject. What does Colorado need protection for?

Mr. KELLEY. For her lead.

Mr. BELFORD. It is 2,000 miles from here to there. The gentleman manufactures Bessemer steel in Pennsylvania. Here is the cost of transportation. Where are the railroads going to be built which will require these Bessemer steel rails? To the South and to the West, through old Mexico, across the Isthmus of Panama, down south to Central America, then to the Argentine Republic, and over to Brazil. We have in my State mountains, solid mountains of iron. We can run a railroad train from those mountains down grade without an engine. And when we come to compete with the iron interests of Pennsylvania I can give notice to my friend that we will not need to stand up here for a tariff on pig-iron.

Oh, yes; you protected lead, but you destroyed the tariff on wool. Favors are equal and mutual on that subject; and when the effort was made to bring that wool question before this House, and I tried to help it, my Democratic friends, with 60 majority, had not the courage even to consider it under the leadership of one of the most distinguished Democrats on that side of the House.

But, Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to another question.

A MEMBER. Come to the trade-dollar!

Mr. BELFORD. I will come to the trade-dollar after awhile. I am "getting in" my hour now. This is the first time I have had an hour for eight years, and I am going to use it. [Laughter.] You recollect, Mr. Speaker (Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair), and I hope you will incorporate it in the memoirs you are going to write as a sequel to those of Mr. Blaine—I have tried my hand at some and possibly failed, but I am in the line of succession—you will remember what was the condition of our currency previous to 1869. What did Congress then do with reference to the coinage of the silver dollar? It passed an act declaring that the debts of this nation should be paid in coin. What was the coin of the Constitution? It was the silver dollar, which before we formed this Government was the unit of value; and the States only gave the right of coinage to the United States upon the express condition that the General Government should keep on with this coinage. That was the basis of the argument in the convention that formulated and brought forth that Constitution. The States never intended to give to the General Government the right to stop the coinage, but they said, "To allow you to make the coinage uniform, as we are to be a nation and a republic, we will give you the power of coinage." Any man who reads the history of that convention can reach no other conclusion.

But the great moneyed interests of this country are always wise, always cunning, and everlastingly diligent in making money dear and everything else cheap. What did they do in 1869? You may say that it was done by a Republican Senate. I care nothing about the name of Republican or the name of Democracy. I am, above all and everything else, for the people of this nation against either party that loans itself to monopoly of any sort. What did they do? As I said, they passed a bill providing that the national debt should be paid in coin. Silver had been the coin of this Republic until they demonetized it—it is alleged by a fraud. That word "coin" was put in the Constitution with an unquestionable meaning. The silver dollar had been the unit of value. It had been the currency of all the States. Our great gold-producing fields had not been discovered. And with that idea in the Constitution, this Congress in 1869 passed a bill providing that the debt of this nation should be payable, not in gold, but in coin—the coin of the Constitution, the coin of our fathers. And yet under the management that they have there in the Treasury Department, with $260,000,000 of debt that is open to redemption to-day, and with a surplus, as I have repeatedly declared, of $150,000,000, we are forced to pay interest to the bondholders and keep the money there in the interest of the bankers.

I say it is time that we members of this House make war upon the theory that dominates this Administration, I care not whether it is Republican or Democratic. I find that communism has absolutely commenced its devastating course in this country. Look at the riots in Cincinnati. You may say that they sprang out of the attempt to administer justice in an individual case. Oh, no; the mantle is too broad for that. You do not get an army that keeps a city in subjection for three or four days on that subject. It is because the people of this country are beginning to realize and feel that no man by honest and legitimate industry can earn twenty millions in one year and deprive the people of the currency that belongs to them in the legitimate exercise of their trade and business. That is what it means. And I advise you gentlemen who have control of this House to see to it that our currency is not diminished while our population is being increased; because with the increase of our population and the diminution of our currency you will see not a riot in Cincinnati only but a riot in every great city of this country, where millions of property will be destroyed, because men can not possess and enjoy by their honest labor a sufficient amount of currency to buy bread for their wives and children. This is a mighty and serious question, and before we act on this question we should ascertain for ourselves whether there is going to be a diminution of the volume of our currency in the interest of the bankers and bondholders of the East.

It is said that I advocate the adoption of this measure because I am a large owner in mines. I can truthfully say that my interest in mines has consisted in paying a large number of laboring men. I have worked many mines from which I never derived a dollar, though I have spent thousands upon them. I am looking at this as a broad national question. I commend it to the House, not on account of the trade-dollar, but on account of the volume of your currency. Let us not allow ourselves to have it diminished, to produce insurrection, to incite riots, to make men poorer on the one side and richer on the other.

What is the fourth section of this bill but a covert attempt to stop the coinage of silver in the face of the act of 1869 and in the face of the Constitution itself? Let us equalize the coinage. That was the object of the Constitution in a large degree.

Mr. Speaker, let us strike out the fourth section of this bill and inform these gentlemen that under no state of circumstances shall they be allowed to diminish the volume of our currency. There, and there alone, is the path of safety for this nation in my judgment.

Now, I voted the other day to extend the bonded period on whisky because I knew it would keep $70,000,000 out of the Treasury and let that amount of money remain in circulation among the people. And yet this House, and I say it respectfully, voted it down by over 100 majority. That, sir, was the result of the performance here the other day. Are my Democratic friends going before the country first with the declaration that they are opposed to the bonded-whisky bill, and then are they going before the country with the still further declaration that they are in favor of abolishing the coinage of silver? Are they going, in the third place, before the country with the open declaration of a reduction of expenditures in reference to the Navy of $8,000,000 below the estimates sent in to Congress by the Navy Department? Are they going before the country with the declaration, in the fourth place, that they cut down the estimates of the Post-Office Department $4,000,000? Gentlemen of the Democratic party, are we forever and forever to hold the White House at the expense of your absolutely silly blunders? [Laughter and applause.] Yes, you may smile, but it is nevertheless all true. I think it was General Grant who declared the Republican party could always trust for success to the blunders of the Democracy. [Laughter and applause.] Why, in the name of Heaven, why do not you men get some sense on these political subjects? [Applause.]

I have promised to yield some of my time, and in the first instance I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] for fifteen minutes.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that in the introduction of this bill the committee saw fit to incorporate the entire silver question. I am so anxious to see this trade-dollar gotten rid of, and feel everybody on the floor of this House is in favor of disposing of that trade-dollar, that I am sorry you have put this rider on this bill, and in that way are absolutely coercing those of the House who want to get rid of this trade-dollar by adding this fourth section to it. Can it be possible that the Congress of the United States has got so much afraid of this financial question that it can not take the financial question pure and simple and bring in one bill at least upon which we may discuss the merits and demerits of that question, without lugging into it, or rather lugging it in, and getting so much of this silver or any other portion of the financial question disposed of, by bringing it in as a rider on a bill the subject of which the whole country is clamoring for and for which every man here is in favor? But I must vote for this bill whether you strike out the fourth section or not. I believe my friend from Nevada [Mr. CASSIDY] must vote for this bill whether you strike out that section or not. I have not heard from the first man on the floor of this House who will not be coerced into voting for this bill whether you strike out that section or not.

Mr. BLAND. I wish to correct the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I can tell him that he will find that a majority of this House will vote against it unless that fourth section be stricken out of the bill. I am in favor of the bill myself, but I can not vote for it as long as that fourth section remains in it.

Mr. BRUMM. I am giving my opinion, and the gentleman from Missouri has given his, and we will see by the result which is correct. As I have said, I must vote for it under the circumstances. I wish to tell you why, and why this House is acting unfairly and, in my judgment, cowardly in introducing this rider upon this trade-dollar, when you should allow the trade-dollar question to stand on its own bottom.

The trade-dollar, Mr. Speaker, was coined as every other dollar that has ever been coined by the authority of the Government of the United States—that is, that it was made a legal tender for $5. A serpent or snake in the grass was allowed to crawl into this House by means of which the silver money was demonetized. With that the trade-dollar fell with the rest. At that time the trade-dollar was not in circulation—that is, in actual circulation out among the people. But when the time came the people demanded the remonetization of silver, and you left the trade-dollar out. The people then were forced—I mean the laboring people—to take these trade-dollars whether they would or not. I am arguing simply the justice of this question. I will read, in the first place, an extract from the Philadelphia Press, of February 14, 1884:

THE TRADE-DOLLAR QUESTION.

The proposed action of Congress in regard to the trade-dollar has caused some buying of them by speculators. The general impression among dealers in them is that some measure will be adopted by Congress which will increase their value to par. It is estimated by Messrs. Zimmerman & Forshay, of Wall street, who have for a long time dealt in trade-dollars, that the number in circulation in the United States is from six to eight millions. The total amount issued was more than 35,000,000, and nearly the whole issue has found its way to China, where it has been stamped by that government.

None of these dollars can be returned to the United States except as bullion. Some dollars have been exported for speculative purposes to Germany and other European countries, but since the price of silver advanced the profit has been small. The dollars now in Germany will be held until it is decided what Congress will do. The price on Wall street lately for large lots has been 90 cents, and some months ago a regular trade sprang up of buying and selling them. New York brokers have shipped a good many of them to Pennsylvania, where they have been used to pay off working people. For this trade individual brokers have shipped from $50,000 to $100,000 in this coin to Philadelphia weekly, for use as wages of operatives in that city and the mining regions. Ninety-one was bid for trade-dollars, and a large amount could not be had for less than 93 and 95.

Mark you, this is in Wall street that this trade springs up. These trade-dollars were used and bought up by brokers and speculators, and were imposed upon the laborers in payment of their wages, especially on laborers in my district of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Is not that a strong argument in favor of never issuing a dollar unless it is worth a dollar?

Mr. BRUMM. It is a strong argument in favor of never issuing a dollar unless you make it a legal tender, my friend.

Mr. WELLER. Good enough!

Mr. BRUMM. It is not a question of intrinsic value. Why, this very trade-dollar itself, containing more silver than the standard dollar, was at 15 per cent. discount when they were discredited. They were at this discount while the standard dollar went from all hands for 100 cents all over this land. Your fiat gave it the 15 per cent. premium over your trade-dollar, notwithstanding that it had 6½ per cent. less intrinsic value than the other, which had no fiat value attached to it. No argument could be stronger in favor of the proposition that I have made than this very fact of the depreciation of an intrinsically more valuable coin when the Government discredited it. It is a warning to Congress never again to issue money unless it makes it a legal tender; and since you have interrupted me on that question, I wish to deny the proposition of my friend from Nevada [Mr. CASSIDY] by stating that there was no paper dollar in circulation, no silver dollar, or no gold dollar that was at a premium over and above any other paper, silver, or gold dollar.

I deny the proposition that the greenback dollar, being at the rate of two hundred and sixty for one hundred of the standard dollars, ever was a dollar. It never was a legal tender, therefore it was not the depreciation of the greenback but the appreciation of the gold. Why, if you had made your duties payable in wildcats only, wildcats would have been at a premium. If you had made them payable in rattlesnakes or in copperheads, loathsome and repulsive as copperheads were during the war, rattlesnakes or copperheads would have been at a premium, and yet men tell us that is the criterion to go by in discussing a financial question! Mr. Speaker, it is a question of what the Government chooses to make money, and of what it shall use as a legal tender, and I care not, sir, as to how much intrinsic value is in the money, whether it be gold, silver, or paper, it must have the Government's fiat to make it a dollar.

Now, to carry out my thought, these trade-dollars were bought up by the brokers. They were sold to the corporations; and my county which comprises my district unfortunately is within the grasp of three or four corporations that control the entire anthracite coal business of the United States. These corporations bought this money at that time, paying 90 cents on the dollar for it, and being in absolute control over the laboring men in the anthracite region they made the workingmen take this coin at par, and then when the crash came they were no more accredited by the bankers, for let me add the bankers and brokers of the large cities were the first to speculate in them when they bought them up, and were the first to take advantage of the speculation when the crash came, and refused to take them over their counters. They got a ring in Wall street again, declaring that they would no more take them except at the bullion value. The workingmen at this time were being paid these dollars at par by the corporations.

Mr. LONG. Do the workingmen in your district hold them now?

Mr. BRUMM. Yes, sir, a great many of them, and when they wanted to pay their fare to get out of the country or travel on the railroad, the same corporations would not take the dollars when they were offered them. The workingmen still hold many of them. Those that they do not hold are now principally in the hands of the business men of that region, because they had to take them for debts, and the business men, let me say, had to take them generally at 100 cents on the dollar, and they hold them now principally as depositors of banks. That is a good argument for declaring them to be legal tender and leaving them where they are, and a good argument why this bill should pass by striking out this fourth section. If the trade-dollar was left on its merits alone, I can not for the life of me see how it can possibly affect even the question that has been generally proposed, i. e., the question of absolute or unlimited coinage of silver.

How many of these dollars exist? You say some eight millions. Why, gentlemen, I believe that of these eight millions over one-half would be kept by individuals as mere relics of barbarism, if for no other reason. Most every one will want to keep one of these peculiar dollars, and they will be kept as relics to a large extent. But of those that do come in, I say in answer specially to the gentleman from New York, the burden of whose speech was that all the silver commissions that had been appointed by all nations had declared that unlimited coinage of silver would be a calamity to any country that undertook it——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRUMM. I should like to have a few moments more just to finish this thought.

Mr. CASSIDY. I yield to the gentleman five minutes longer.

Mr. BRUMM. Supposing that you pass this bill with the fourth section out, I ask of you, gentlemen, in all sincerity, do you believe that the few trade-dollars that are still in existence will in any way materially affect the question of the unlimited coinage of silver? You have branched out upon that question on both sides as though the very gist and marrow of this question depended upon the question of unlimited coinage or the question of the absolute stopping of coinage. This bill does not affect that question directly, nor at all in fact. The trade-dollars can only affect it to the extent of the number that are in existence, and to that extent you are practically curtailing the currency; you are practically making the volume of your currency short to that extent. It is true your trade-dollars are not floating from hand to hand; but they are being held by the business men, who have deposited them in banks; and there they are to the credit of these business men as deposits or as collaterals. And if these trade-dollars were not there, there would have to be some other kind of money there. Therefore they are practically in circulation or serving as substitutes for circulation; and if you adopt this fourth section you are practically contracting the currency to that extent. And while you are clamoring about contraction of the currency by the payment of the national debt compelling the retirement of the bank note, and assert that it will produce a panic, why do you aggravate the contraction by recoining the trade-dollar without supplying its place? I ask in all honesty and candor whether you are willing to do that simply because it may keep in circulation a few dollars more of silver, and thus make our basis a little broader and to that extent the more difficult to corner by the gold-bug?

CHARGES AGAINST H. V. BOYNTON.

Mr. HOPKINS. I rise to make a privileged report. I am instructed by the select committee appointed to investigate charges against H. V. Boynton to present its report. The resolution which concludes the report is unanimously agreed to by the committee. There are some points of disagreement on which the minority wish to have their views printed. I ask to have the report printed and laid over, and I will call it up for adoption hereafter.

The SPEAKER. The report will be printed and laid over, and if there be no objection the minority will have leave to present its views to be printed with the report of the majority.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the reading of the resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the charges against H. V. Boynton are not sustained by the evidence, and that there is no ground for any action by the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Several messages, in writing, from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, his Secretary, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed a bill and joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 4971) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 215) reappropriating the sum of $125,000 not expended for the relief of sufferers by the floods of the Mississippi River.

TRADE-DOLLAR.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4976) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar.

Mr. BELFORD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], after which I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. MILLS. I only take the floor to ask the House to vote down the previous question when it is moved on this bill. It is a very important measure and all the discussion which we have had and all that we are to have upon it is utterly worthless if we are not permitted to avail ourselves of the light we have been receiving by offering proper amendments to this measure.

It is a very difficult matter indeed for the numerous bills that are presented to this House and referred to the committees to get even a report, favorable or unfavorable, from a committee. But it is much more difficult to get a bill reported by a committee up for consideration in this House. This important measure has overcome all these intervening obstacles and is now before this House for consideration; and I hope the House will not permit its impatience to induce it to close down the opportunity for debate and amendment on the measure with a view of perfecting it. There are several amendments that have been proposed which ought to be considered. And I do not mean that we ought simply to speak on them with the door closed in our face, and then drive the bill to a vote in this House as it comes from the committee so that the House shall be compelled to vote for or against it without any modification.

As I said the other day, I have an amendment which I intend to offer if permitted to get to the point in the bill where it can be amended to provide we shall stop coining the denomination of dollar. That amendment meets the approbation of many gentlemen on both sides of this House. It is recognized as an inconvenient coin all over the country, and it is recognized by the representatives of the people here as an inconvenient coin. The people want money for convenience, and they will have it sooner or later. And now that we have this measure before us, we ought to avail ourselves of the opportunity, so very rare in this House, to change this obnoxious law.

I will not now, Mr. Speaker, enter upon the discussion of the different coins that we have had and that we have repealed. If we get so that we can offer amendments, I will do so within four or five minutes. But it is important we should now consider this question; and I rose simply to ask the House when we get a vote to vote down the previous question in order that we may consider these amendments.

Mr. Speaker, lest I may not have the happy fortune to get the floor again on this question, I desire to ask to have printed as a part of my remarks the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on the legal-tender question, both the majority and minority opinions. I send them to the desk without asking to have them read, but ask that they may be printed in the RECORD. I do so because it is very rare copies of this decision can be procured. I got this one from the clerk of the Supreme Court, who had to hunt for some time before he could get one copy. I have not had time to read the opinions myself, but I desire to do so, and I ask to have them printed in the RECORD for the information of the House.

There was no objection.

The decision of the Supreme Court and the dissenting opinion are as follows:

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

No. 9.—October term, 1883.

Augustus D. Juilliard, plaintiff in error, vs. Thomas S. Greenman. In error to the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York.

Congress has the constitutional power to make the Treasury notes of the United States a legal tender in payment of private debts in time of peace as well as in time of war.

Under the act of May 31, 1878, chapter 146, which enacts that notes of the United States issued during the war of the rebellion under acts of Congress declaring them to be a legal tender in payment of private debts, and since the close of that war redeemed and paid in gold coin at the Treasury, shall be reissued and kept in circulation, notes so reissued are a legal tender.

[March 3, 1884.]

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court.

Juilliard, a citizen of New York, brought an action against Greenman, a citizen of Connecticut, in the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York, alleging that the plaintiff sold and delivered to the defendant, at his special instance and request, one hundred bales of cotton, of the value and for the agreed price of $5,122.90, and that the defendant agreed to pay that sum in cash on the delivery of the cotton, and had not paid the same or any part thereof, except that he had paid the sum of $22.90 on account, and was now justly indebted to the plaintiff therefor in the sum of $5,100, and demanding judgment for this sum with interest and costs.

The defendant in his answer admitted the citizenship of the parties, the purchase and delivery of the cotton, and the agreement to pay therefor, as alleged; and averred that after the delivery of the cotton he offered and tendered to the plaintiff, in full payment, $22.50 in gold coin of the United States, forty cents in silver coin of the United States, and two United States notes, one of the denomination of $5,000 and the other of the denomination of $100, of the description known as United States legal-tender notes, purporting by recital thereon to be legal tender, at their respective face values, for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt, and which, after having been presented for payment, and redeemed and paid in gold coin, since January 1, 1879, at the United States subtreasury in New York, had been reissued and kept in circulation under and in pursuance of the act of Congress of May 31, 1878, chapter 146; that at the time of offering and tendering these notes and coin to the plaintiff the sum of $5,122.90 was the entire amount due and owing in payment for the cotton, but the plaintiff declined to receive the notes in payment of $5,100 thereof; and that the defendant had ever since remained, and still was, ready and willing to pay to the plaintiff the sum of $5,100 in these notes, and brought these notes into court, ready to be paid to the plaintiff if he would accept them.

The plaintiff demurred to the answer upon the grounds that the defense, consisting of new matter, was insufficient in law upon its face, and that the facts stated in the answer did not constitute any defense to the cause of action alleged.

The circuit court overruled the demurrer and gave judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff sued out his writ of error.

The amount which the plaintiff seeks to recover, and which, if the tender pleaded is insufficient in law, he is entitled to recover, is $5,100. There can, therefore, be no doubt of the jurisdiction of this court to revise the judgment of the circuit court. (Act of February 16, 1875, ch. 77, sec. 3; 18 Stat., 315.)

The notes of the United States, tendered in payment of the defendant's debt to the plaintiff, were originally issued under the acts of Congress of February 25, 1862, ch. 33, July 11, 1862, ch. 142, and March 3, 1863, ch. 73, passed during the war of the rebellion, and enacting that these notes should "be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States," except for duties on imports and interest on the public debt. (12 Stat., 345, 532, 709.)

The provisions of the earlier acts of Congress, so far as it is necessary for the understanding of the recent statutes to quote them, are re-enacted in the following provisions of the Revised Statutes:

"SEC. 3579. When any United States notes are returned to the Treasury, they may be reissued, from time to time, as the exigencies of the public interest may require.

"SEC. 3580. When any United States notes returned to the Treasury are so mutilated or otherwise injured as to be unfit for use, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to replace the same with others of the same character and amounts.

"SEC. 3581. Mutilated United States notes, when replaced according to law, and all other notes which by law are required to be taken up and not reissued, when taken up shall be destroyed in such manner and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

"SEC. 3582. The authority given to the Secretary of the Treasury to make any reduction of the currency, by retiring and canceling United States notes, is suspended."

"SEC. 3588. United States notes shall be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except for duties on imports and interest on the public debt."

The act of January 14, 1875, chapter 15, "to provide for the resumption of specie payments," enacted that on and after January 1, 1879, "the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem in coin the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding, on their presentation for redemption at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York, in sums of not less than $50;" and authorized him to use for that purpose any surplus revenues in the Treasury and the proceeds of the sales of certain bonds of the United States. (18 Stat., 296.)

The act of May 31, 1878, chapter 146, under which the notes in question were reissued, is entitled "An act to forbid the further retirement of United States legal-tender notes," and enacts as follows:

"From and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury or other officer under him to cancel or retire any more of the United States legal-tender notes. And when any of said notes may be redeemed or be received into the Treasury under any law from any source whatever and shall belong to the United States, they shall not be retired, canceled, or destroyed, but they shall be reissued and paid out again and kept in circulation: Provided, That nothing herein shall prohibit the cancellation and destruction of mutilated notes and the issue of other notes of like denomination in their stead, as now provided by law. All acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed." (20 Stat., 87.)

The manifest intention of this act is that the notes which it directs, after having been redeemed, to be reissued and kept in circulation, shall retain their original quality of being a legal tender.

The single question, therefore, to be considered, and upon the answer to which the judgment to be rendered between these parties depends, is whether notes of the United States, issued in time of war, under acts of Congress declaring them to be a legal tender in payment of private debts, and afterward in time of peace redeemed and paid in gold coin at the Treasury, and then reissued under the act of 1878, can, under the Constitution of the United States, be a legal tender in payment of such debts.

Upon full consideration of the case, the court is unanimously of opinion that it can not be distinguished in principle from the cases heretofore determined, reported under the names of the Legal-tender Cases, 12 Wall., 457; Dooly vs. Smith, 13 Wall., 604; Railroad Company vs. Johnson, 15 Wall., 195; and Maryland vs. Railroad Company, 22 Wall., 105; and all the judges, except Mr. Justice Field, who adheres to the views expressed in his dissenting opinions in those cases, are of opinion that they were rightly decided.

The elaborate printed briefs submitted by counsel in this case, and the opinions delivered in the legal-tender cases, and in the earlier case of Hepburn vs. Griswold, 8 Wall., 603, which those cases overruled, forcibly present the arguments on either side of the question of the power of Congress to make the notes of the United States a legal tender in payment of private debts. Without undertaking to deal with all those arguments, the court has thought it fit that the grounds of its judgement in the case at bar should be fully stated.

No question of the scope and extent of the implied powers of Congress under the Constitution can be satisfactorily discussed without repeating much of the reasoning of Chief-Justice Marshall in the great judgment in McCulloch vs. Maryland, 4 Wheat., 316, by which the power of Congress to incorporate a bank was demonstrated and affirmed, notwithstanding the Constitution does not enumerate, among the powers granted, that of establishing a bank or creating a corporation.

The people of the United States by the Constitution established a National Government, with sovereign powers, legislative, executive, and judicial. "The Government of the Union," said Chief-Justice Marshall, "though limited in its powers, is supreme within its sphere of action;" "and its laws, when made in pursuance of the Constitution, form the supreme law of the land." "Among the enumerated powers of Government we find the great powers to lay and collect taxes; to borrow money; to regulate commerce; to declare and conduct a war; and to raise and support armies and navies. The sword and the purse, all the external relations, and no inconsiderable portion of the industry of the nation, are intrusted to its government." (4 Wheat., 405, 406, 407.)

A constitution establishing a frame of government, declaring fundamental principles, and creating a national sovereignty, and intended to endure for ages and to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs, is not to be interpreted with the strictness of a private contract. The Constitution of the United States, by apt words of designation or general description, marks the outlines of the powers granted to the National Legislature, but it does not undertake with the precision and detail of a code of laws to enumerate the subdivisions of those powers or to specify all the means by which they may be carried into execution. Chief-Justice Marshall, after dwelling upon this view, as required by the very nature of the Constitution, by the language in which it is framed, by the limitations upon the general powers of Congress introduced in the ninth section of the first article, and by the omission to use any restrictive term which might prevent its receiving a fair and just interpretation, added these emphatic words: "In considering this question, then, we must never forget that it is a constitution we are expounding." (4 Wheat., 407. See also page 415.)

The breadth and comprehensiveness of the words of the Constitution are nowhere more strikingly exhibited than in regard to the powers over the subjects of revenue, finance, and currency, of which there is no other express grant than may be found in these few brief clauses:

"The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States;

"To borrow money on the credit of the United States;

"To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes;

"To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures."

The section which contains the grant of these and other principal legislative powers concludes by declaring that the Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or officer thereof."

By the settled construction and the only reasonable interpretation of this clause the words "necessary and proper" are not limited to such measures as are absolutely and indispensably necessary, without which the powers granted must fail of execution, but they include all appropriate means which are conducive or adapted to the end to be accomplished, and which in the judgment of Congress will most advantageously effect it.

That clause of the Constitution which declares that "the Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States" either embodies a grant of power to pay the debts of the United States or presupposes and assumes that power as inherent in the United States as a sovereign government. But, in whichever aspect it be considered, neither this nor any other clause of the Constitution makes any mention of priority or preference of the United States as a creditor over other creditors of an individual debtor. Yet this court, in the early case of United States vs. Fisher, 2 Cranch, 358, held that under the power to pay the debts of the United States Congress had the power to enact that debts due to the United States should have that priority of payment out of the estate of an insolvent debtor which the law of England gave to debts due to the crown.

In delivering judgment in that case Chief-Justice Marshall expounded the clause giving Congress power to make all necessary and proper laws as follows: "In construing this clause it would be incorrect and would produce endless difficulties if the opinion should be maintained that no law was authorized which was not indispensably necessary to give effect to a specified power. Where various systems might be adopted for that purpose it might be said with respect to each that it was not necessary because the end might be obtained by other means. Congress must possess the choice of means and must be empowered to use any means which are in fact conducive to the exercise of a power granted by the Constitution. The Government is to pay the debt of the Union, and must be authorized to use the means which appear to itself the most eligible to effect that object." (2 Cranch, 396.)

In McCulloch vs. Maryland he more fully developed the same view, concluding thus: "We admit, as all must admit, that the powers of the Government are limited, and that its limits are not to be transcended. But we think the sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the National Legislature that discretion with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional." (4 Wheat., 421.)

The rule of interpretation thus laid down has been constantly adhered to and acted on by this court, and was accepted as expressing the true test by all the judges who took part in the former discussions of the power of Congress to make the Treasury notes of the United States a legal tender in payment of private debts.

The other judgments delivered by Chief-Justice Marshall contain nothing adverse to the power of Congress to issue legal-tender notes.

By the Articles of Confederation of 1777, the United States in Congress assembled were authorized "to borrow money or emit bills on the credit of the United States;" but it was declared that "each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled." (Art. 2; art. 9, sec. 5; 1 Stat., 4, 7.) Yet, upon the question whether, under those articles, Congress, by virtue of the power to emit bills on the credit of the United States, had the power to make bills so emitted a legal tender, Chief-Justice Marshall spoke very guardedly, saying: "Congress emitted bills of credit to a large amount, and did not, perhaps could not, make them a legal tender. This power resided in the States." (Craig vs. Missouri, 4 Pet., 410, 435.) But in the Constitution, as he had before observed in McCulloch vs. Maryland, "there is no phrase which, like the Articles of Confederation, excludes incidental or implied powers, and which requires that everything granted shall be expressly and minutely described. Even the tenth amendment, which was framed for the purpose of quieting the excessive jealousies which had been excited, omits the word 'expressly,' and declares only that the powers 'not delegated to the United States, nor prohibited to the States, are reserved to the States or to the people;' thus leaving the question whether the particular power which may become the subject of contest has been delegated to the one government or prohibited to the other to depend on a fair construction of the whole instrument. The men who drew and adopted this amendment had experienced the embarrassments resulting from the insertion of this word in the Articles of Confederation, and probably omitted it to avoid those embarrassments." (4 Wheat., 405, 406.)

The sentence sometimes quoted from his opinion in Sturges vs. Crowninshield had exclusive relation to the restrictions imposed by the Constitution on the powers of the States, and especial reference to the effect of the clause prohibiting the States from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts, as will clearly appear by quoting the whole paragraph: "Was this general prohibition intended to prevent paper money? We are not allowed to say so, because it is expressly provided that no State shall 'emit bills of credit;' neither could these words be intended to restrain the States from enabling debtors to discharge their debts by the tender of property of no real value to the creditor, because for that subject also particular provision is made. Nothing but gold and silver coin can be made a tender in payment of debts." (4 Wheat., 122, 204.)

Such reports as have come down to us of the debates in the convention that framed the Constitution afford no proof of any general concurrence of opinion upon the subject before us. The adoption of the motion to strike out the words "and emit bills" from the clause "to borrow money and emit bills on the credit of the United States" is quite inconclusive. The philippic delivered before the Assembly of Maryland by Mr. Martin, one of the delegates from that State, who voted against the motion, and who declined to sign the Constitution, can hardly be accepted as satisfactory evidence of the reasons or the motives of the majority of the convention. (See 1 Elliot's Debates, 345, 370, 376.) Some of the members of the convention, indeed, as appears by Mr. Madison's minutes of the debates, expressed the strongest opposition to paper money. And Mr. Madison has disclosed the grounds of his own action by recording that "this vote in the affirmative by Virginia was occasioned by the acquiescence of Mr. Madison, who became satisfied that striking out the words would not disable the Government from the use of public notes, so far as they could be safe and proper; and would only cut off the pretext for a paper currency, and particularly for making the bills a tender, either for public or private debts."

But he has not explained why he thought that striking out the words "and emit bills" would leave the power to emit bills, and deny the power to make them a tender in payment of debts. And it can not be known how many of the other delegates, by whose vote the motion was adopted, intended neither to proclaim nor to deny the power to emit paper money, and were influenced by the argument of Mr. Gorham, who "was for striking out, without inserting any prohibition," and who said: "If the words stand, they may suggest and lead to the emission." "The power, so far as it will be necessary or safe, will be involved in that of borrowing." (5 Elliot's Debates, 434, 435, and note.) And after the first clause of the tenth section of the first article had been reported in the form in which it now stands, forbidding the States to make anything but gold or silver coin a tender in payment of debts, or to pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, when Mr. Gerry, as reported by Mr. Madison, "entered into observations inculcating the importance of public faith, and the propriety of the restraint put on the States from impairing the obligation of contracts, alleging that Congress ought to be laid under the like prohibitions," and made a motion to that effect, he was not seconded. (Ib., 546.) As an illustration of the danger of giving too much weight upon such a question to the debates and the votes in the convention, it may also be observed that propositions to authorize Congress to grant charters of incorporation for national objects were strongly opposed, especially as regarded banks, and defeated. (Ib., 440, 543, 544.) The power of Congress to emit bills of credit, as well as to incorporate national banks, is now clearly established by decisions to which we shall presently refer.

The words "to borrow money," as used in the Constitution, to designate a power vested in the National Government, for the safety and welfare of the whole people, are not to receive that limited and restricted interpretation and meaning which they would have in a penal statute, or in an authority conferred, by law or by contract, upon trustees or agents for private purposes.

The power "to borrow money on the credit of the United States" is the power to raise money for the public use on a pledge of the public credit, and may be exercised to meet either present or anticipated expenses and liabilities of the Government. It includes the power to issue, in return for the money borrowed, the obligations of the United States in any appropriate form, of stock, bonds, bills, or notes; and in whatever form they are issued, being instruments of the National Government, they are exempt from taxation by the governments of the several States. (Weston vs. Charleston City Council, 2 Pet., 449; Banks vs. Mayor, 7 Wall., 16; Bank vs. Supervisors, 7 Wall., 26.) Congress has authority to issue these obligations in a form adapted to circulation from hand to hand in the ordinary transactions of commerce and business. In order to promote and facilitate such circulation, to adapt them to use as currency, and to make them more current in the market, it may provide for their redemption in coin or bonds, and may make them receivable in payment of debts to the Government. So much is settled beyond doubt, and was asserted or distinctly admitted by the judges who dissented from the decision in the Legal-tender cases, as well as by those who concurred in that decision. (Veazie Bank vs. Fenno, 8 Wall., 533, 548; Hepburn vs. Griswold, 8 Wall., 616, 636; Legal-tender cases, 12 Wall., 543, 544, 560, 582, 610, 613, 637.)

It is equally well settled that Congress has the power to incorporate national banks, with the capacity, for their own profit as well as for the use of the Government in its money transactions, of issuing bills which under ordinary circumstances pass from hand to hand as money at their nominal value, and which, when so current, the law has always recognized as a good tender in payment of money debts, unless specifically objected to at the time of the tender. (United States Bank vs. Bank of Georgia, 10 Wheat., 333, 347; Ward vs. Smith, 7 Wall., 447, 451.) The power of Congress to charter a bank was maintained in McCulloch vs. Maryland, 4 Wheat., 316, and in Osborn vs. United States Bank, 9 Wheat., 738, chiefly upon the ground that it was an appropriate means for carrying on the money transactions of the Government. But Chief-Justice Marshall said: "The currency which it circulates, by means of its trade with individuals, is believed to make it a more fit instrument for the purposes of government than it could otherwise be; and, if this be true, the capacity to carry on this trade is a faculty indispensable to the character and objects of the institution." (9 Wheat., 864.) And Mr. Justice Johnson, who concurred with the rest of the court in upholding the power to incorporate a bank, gave the further reason that it tended to give effect to "that power over the currency of the country which the framers of the Constitution evidently intended to give to Congress alone." (Ib., 873.)

The constitutional authority of Congress to provide a currency for the whole country is now firmly established. In Veazie Bank vs. Fenno, 8 Wall., 533, 548, Chief-Justice Chase, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It can not be doubted that under the Constitution the power to provide a circulation of coin is given to Congress. And it is settled by the uniform practice of the Government, and by repeated decisions, that Congress may constitutionally authorize the emission of bills of credit." Congress, having undertaken to supply a national currency, consisting of coin, of Treasury-notes of the United States, and of the bills of national banks, is authorized to impose on all State banks, or national banks, or private bankers, paying out the notes of individuals or of State banks, a tax of 10 per cent. upon the amount of such notes so paid out. (Veazie Bank vs. Fenno, above cited; National Bank vs. United States, 101 U. S., 1.) The reason for this conclusion was stated by Chief-Justice Chase, and repeated by the present Chief-Justice, in these words: "Having thus, in the exercise of undisputed constitutional powers, undertaken to provide a currency for the whole country, it can not be questioned that Congress may, constitutionally, secure the benefit of it to the people by appropriate legislation. To this end, Congress has denied the quality of legal tender to foreign coins, and has provided by law against the imposition of counterfeit and base coin on the community. To the same end, Congress may restrain, by suitable enactments, the circulation as money of any notes not issued under its own authority. Without this power, indeed, its attempts to secure a sound and uniform currency for the country must be futile." (8 Wall., 549; 101 U. S., 6.)

By the Constitution of the United States the several States are prohibited from coining money, emitting bills of credit, or making anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts. But no intention can be inferred from this to deny to Congress either of these powers. Most of the powers granted to Congress are described in the eighth section of the first article; the limitations intended to be set to its powers, so as to exclude certain things which might otherwise be taken to be included in the general grant, are defined in the ninth section; the tenth section is addressed to the States only. This section prohibits the States from doing some things which the United States are expressly prohibited from doing, as well as from doing some things which the United States are expressly authorized to do, and from doing some things which are neither expressly granted nor expressly denied to the United States. Congress and the States equally are expressly prohibited from passing any bill of attainder or ex post facto law, or granting any title of nobility. The States are forbidden, while the President and Senate are expressly authorized, to make treaties. The States are forbidden, but Congress is expressly authorized, to coin money. The States are prohibited from emitting bills of credit; but Congress, which is neither expressly authorized nor expressly forbidden to do so, has, as we have already seen, been held to have the power of emitting bills of credit, and of making every provision for their circulation as currency, short of giving them the quality of legal tender for private debts—even by those who have denied its authority to give them this quality.

It appears to us to follow, as a logical and necessary consequence, that Congress has the power to issue the obligations of the United States in such form, and to impress upon them such qualities as currency for the purchase of merchandise and the payment of debts, as accord with the usage of sovereign governments. The power, as incident to the power of borrowing money and issuing bills or notes of the government for money borrowed, of impressing upon those bills or notes the quality of being a legal tender for the payment of private debts, was a power universally understood to belong to sovereignty, in Europe and America, at the time of the framing and adoption of the Constitution of the United States. The governments of Europe, acting through the monarch or the legislature, according to the distribution of powers under their respective constitutions, had and have as sovereign a power of issuing paper money as of stamping coin. This power has been distinctly recognized in an important modern case, ably argued and fully considered, in which the Emperor of Austria, as King of Hungary, obtained from the English court of chancery an injunction against the issue in England, without his license, of notes purporting to be public paper money of Hungary. (Austria vs. Day, 2 Giff., 628, and 3 D. F. & J., 217.) The power of issuing bills of credit, and making them, at the discretion of the Legislature, a tender in payment of private debts, had long been exercised in this country by the several Colonies and States; and during the Revolutionary war the States, upon the recommendation of the Congress of the Confederation, had made the bills issued by Congress a legal tender. (See Craig vs. Missouri, 4 Pet., 435, 453; Briscoe vs. Bank of Kentucky, 11 Pet., 257, 313, 334-336; Legal-tender cases, 12 Wall., 557, 558, 622; Phillips on American Paper Currency, passim.) The exercise of this power not being prohibited to Congress by the Constitution, it is included in the power expressly granted to borrow money on the credit of the United States.

This position is fortified by the fact that Congress is vested with the exclusive exercise of the analogous power of coining money and regulating the value of domestic and foreign coin, and also with the paramount power of regulating foreign and interstate commerce. Under the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States, and to issue circulating notes for the money borrowed, its power to define the quality and force of those notes as currency is as broad as the like power over a metallic currency under the power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof. Under the two powers, taken together, Congress is authorized to establish a national currency, either in coin or in paper, and to make that currency lawful money for all purposes as regards the National Government or private individuals.

The power of making the notes of the United States a legal tender in payment of private debts, being included in the power to borrow money and to provide a national currency, is not defeated or restricted by the fact that its exercise may affect the value of private contracts. If, upon a just and fair interpretation of the whole Constitution, a particular power or authority appears to be vested in Congress, it is no constitutional objection to its existence or to its exercise that the property or the contracts of individuals may be incidentally affected. The decisions of this court already cited afford several examples of this.

Upon the issue of stock, bonds, bills, or notes of the United States, the States are deprived of their power of taxation to the extent of the property invested by individuals in such obligations, and the burden of State taxation upon other private property is correspondingly increased. The 10 per cent. tax, imposed by Congress on notes of State banks and of private bankers, not only lessens the value of such notes, but tends to drive them, and all State banks of issue, out of existence. The priority given to debts due to the United States over the private debts of an insolvent debtor diminishes the value of these debts, and the amount which their holders may receive out of the debtor's estate.

So, under the power to coin money and to regulate its value, Congress may (as it did with regard to gold by the act of June 28, 1834, ch. 95, and with regard to silver by the act of February 28, 1878, ch. 20) issue coins of the same denomination as those already current by law, but of less intrinsic value than those by reason of containing a less weight of the precious metals and thereby enable debtors to discharge their debts by the payment of coins of the less real value. A contract to pay a certain sum in money without any stipulation as to the kind of money in which it shall be paid may always be satisfied by payment of that sum in any currency which is lawful money at the place and time at which payment is to be made. (1 Hale P. C., 192-194; Bac. Ab. Tender, B., 2; Pothier Contract of Sale, No. 416; Pardessus Droit Commercial, Nos. 204, 205; Searight vs. Calbraith, 4 Dall., 324.) As observed by Mr. Justice Strong in delivering the opinion of the court in the Legal-tender cases, "Every contract for the payment of money simply is necessarily subject to the constitutional power of the Government over the currency, whatever that power may be, and the obligation of the party is therefore assumed with reference to that power." (12 Wall., 549.)

Congress, as the legislature of a sovereign nation, being expressly empowered by the Constitution "to lay and collect taxes, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," and "to borrow money on the credit of the United States," and "to coin money and regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin;" and being clearly authorized, as incidental to the exercise of those great powers, to emit bills of credit, to charter national banks, and to provide a national currency for the whole people in the form of coin, Treasury notes, and national-bank bills, and the power to make the notes of the Government a legal tender in payment of private debts being one of the powers belonging to sovereignty in other civilized nations, and not expressly withheld from Congress by the Constitution, we are irresistibly impelled to the conclusion that the impressing upon the Treasury notes of the United States the quality of being a legal tender in payment of private debts is an appropriate means, conducive and plainly adapted to the execution of the undoubted powers of Congress, consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, and therefore, within the meaning of that instrument, "necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States."

Such being our conclusion in matter of law, the question whether at any particular time, in war or in peace, the exigency is such, by reason of unusual and pressing demands on the resources of the Government, or of the inadequacy of the supply of gold and silver coin to furnish the currency needed for the uses of the Government and of the people, that it is, as matter of fact, wise and expedient to resort to this means is a political question to be determined by Congress when the question of exigency arises, and not a judicial question to be afterward passed upon by the courts. To quote once more from the judgment in McCulloch vs. Maryland: "Where the law is not prohibited, and is really calculated to effect any of the objects intrusted to the Government, to undertake here to inquire into the degree of its necessity would be to pass the line which circumscribes the judicial department, and to tread on legislative ground." (4 Wheat., 423.)

It follows that the act of May 31, 1878, chapter 146, is constitutional and valid, and that the circuit court rightly held that the tender in Treasury notes reissued and kept in circulation under that act was a tender of lawful money in payment of the defendant's debt to plaintiff.

Judgment affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

No. 9.—October term, 1883.

Augustus D. Juilliard, plaintiff in error, vs. Thomas S. Greenman. In error to the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York.

Mr. Justice Field, dissenting.

From the judgment of the court in this case, and from all the positions advanced in its support, I dissent. The question of the power of Congress to impart the quality of legal tender to the notes of the United States, and thus make them money and a standard of value, is not new here. Unfortunately, it has been too frequently before the court, and its latest decision, previous to this one, has never been entirely accepted and approved by the country. Nor should this excite surprise, for whenever it is declared that this Government, ordained to establish justice, has the power to alter the condition of contracts between private parties, and authorize their payment or discharge in something different from that which the parties stipulated, thus disturbing the relations of commerce and the business of the community generally, the doctrine will not and ought not to be readily accepted. There will be many who will adhere to the teachings and abide by the faith of their fathers. So the question has come again, and will continue to come until it is settled so as to uphold and not impair the contracts of parties, to promote and not defeat justice.

If there be anything in the history of the Constitution which can be established with moral certainty, it is that the framers of that instrument intended to prohibit the issue of legal-tender notes both by the General Government and by the States, and thus prevent interference with the contracts of private parties. During the Revolution and the period of the old Confederation the Continental Congress issued bills of credit, and upon its recommendation the States made them a legal tender and the refusal to receive them an extinguishment of the debts for which they were offered. They also enacted severe penalties against those who refused to accept them at their nominal value, as equal to coin, in exchange for commodities. And previously, as early as January, 1776, Congress had declared that if any person should be "so lost to all virtue and regard for his country" as to refuse to receive in payment the bills then issued, he should, on conviction thereof, be "deemed, published, and treated as an enemy of his country, and precluded from all trade and intercourse with the inhabitants of the colonies."

Yet this legislation proved ineffectual; the universal law of currency prevailed which makes promises of money valuable only as they are convertible into coin. The notes depreciated until they became valueless in the hands of their possessors. So it always will be; legislative declaration can not make the promise of a thing the equivalent of the thing itself.

The legislation to which the States were thus induced to resort was not confined to the attempt to make paper money a legal tender for debts, but the principle that private contracts could be legally impaired and their obligation disregarded being once established, other measures equally dishonest and destructive of good faith between parties were adopted. What followed is thus stated by Mr. Justice Story in his Commentaries: "The history, indeed," he says, "of the various laws which were passed by the States in their colonial and independent character upon this subject is startling at once to our morals, to our patriotism, and to our sense of justice. Not only was paper money issued and declared to be a tender in payment of debts, but laws of another character, well known under the appellation of tender laws, appraisement laws, installment laws, and suspension laws, were from time to time enacted, which prostrated all private credit and all private morals. By some of these laws the due payment of debts was suspended; debts were, in violation of the very terms of the contract, authorized to be paid by installments at different periods; property of any sort, however worthless, either real or personal, might be tendered by the debtor in payment of his debts, and the creditor was compelled to take the property of the debtor which he might seize on execution at an appraisement wholly disproportionate to its known value. Such grievances and oppressions, and others of a like nature, were the ordinary results of legislation during the Revolutionary war and the intermediate period down to the formation of the Constitution. They entailed the most enormous evils on the country, and introduced a system of fraud, chicanery, and profligacy which destroyed all private confidence and all industry and enterprise" (2d vol., sec. 1371).

To put an end to this vicious system of legislation which only encouraged fraud, thus graphically described by Story, the clauses which forbid the States from emitting bills of credit or making anything but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts, or passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts, were inserted in the Constitution. "The attention of the convention, therefore," says Chief-Justice Marshall, "was particularly directed to paper money and to acts which enabled the debtor to discharge his debt otherwise than was stipulated in the contract. Had nothing more been intended, nothing more would have been expressed, but in the opinion of the convention much more remained to be done. The same mischief might be effected by other means. To restore public confidence completely it was necessary, not only to prohibit the use of particular means by which it might be effected, but to prohibit the use of any means by which the same mischief might be produced. The convention appears to have intended to establish a great principle, that contracts should be inviolable." (Sturgis vs. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat., 200.)

It would be difficult to believe, even in the absence of the historical evidence we have on the subject, that the framers of the Constitution, profoundly impressed by the evils resulting from this kind of legislation, ever intended that the new government, ordained to establish justice, should possess the power of making its bills a legal tender, which they were unwilling should remain with the States, and which in the past had proved so dangerous to the peace of the community, so disturbing to the business of the people, and so destructive of their morality.

The great historian of our country has recently given to the world a history of the convention, the result of years of labor in the examination of all public documents relating to its formation and of the recorded opinions of its framers; and thus he writes: "With the full recollection of the need or seeming need of paper money in the Revolution, with the menace of danger in future time of war from its prohibition, authority to issue bills of credit that should be legal tender was refused to the General Government by the vote of nine States against New Jersey and Maryland. It was Madison who decided the vote of Virginia, and he has left his testimony that 'the pretext for paper currency, and particularly for making the bills a tender, either for public or private debts, was cut off.' This is the interpretation of the clause made at the time of its adoption, alike by its authors and by its opponents, accepted by all the statesmen of that age, not open to dispute because too clear for argument, and never disputed so long as any one man who took part in framing the Constitution remained alive. History can not name a man who has gained enduring honor by causing the issue of paper money. Wherever such paper has been employed it has, in every case, thrown upon its authors the burden of exculpation under the plea of pressing necessity." (Bancroft's History of the formation of the Constitution of the United States, vol. 2, 134.)

And when the convention came to the prohibition upon the States, the historian says that the clause "no State shall make anything but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts" was accepted without a dissentient State. "So the adoption of the Constitution," he adds, "is to be the end forever of paper money, whether issued by the several States or by the United States, if the Constitution shall be rightly interpreted and honestly obeyed." (Vol. 2, 137.)

For nearly three-quarters of a century after the adoption of the Constitution, and until the legislation during the recent civil war, no jurist and no statesman of any position in the country ever pretended that a power to impart the quality of legal tender to its notes was vested in the General Government. There is no recorded word of even one in favor of its possessing the power. All conceded, as an axiom of constitutional law, that the power did not exist.

Mr. Webster, from his first entrance into public life in 1812, gave great consideration to the subject of the currency, and in an elaborate speech on that subject, made in the Senate in 1836, then sitting in this room, he said: "Currency, in a large and perhaps just sense, includes not only gold and silver and bank bills, but bills of exchange also. It may include all that adjusts exchanges and settles balances in the operations of trade and business; but if we understand by currency the legal money of the country, and that which constitutes a legal tender for debts, and is the standard measure of value, then undoubtedly nothing is included but gold and silver. Most unquestionably there is no legal tender, and there can be no legal tender in this country, under the authority of this Government or any other, but gold and silver, either the coinage of our own mints or foreign coins at rates regulated by Congress. This is a constitutional principle, perfectly plain and of the highest importance. The States are expressly prohibited from making anything but gold and silver a legal tender in payment of debts, and although no such express prohibition is applied to Congress, yet, as Congress has no power granted to it in this respect but to coin money and to regulate the value of foreign coins, it clearly has no power to substitute paper or anything else for coin as a tender in payment of debts and in discharge of contracts. Congress has exercised this power fully in both its branches; it has coined money, and still coins it; it has regulated the value of foreign coins, and still regulates their value. The legal tender, therefore, the constitutional standard of value, is established and can not be overthrown. To overthrow it would shake the whole system." (Webster's Works, vol. 4, 271.)

When the idea of imparting the legal-tender quality to the notes of the United States issued under the first act of 1862 was first broached, the advocates of the measure rested their support of it on the ground that it was a war measure, to which the country was compelled to resort by the exigencies of its condition, being then sorely pressed by the confederate forces, and requiring the daily expenditure of enormous sums to maintain its Army and Navy, and to carry on the Government. The Representative who introduced the bill in the House declared that it was a measure of that nature, "one of necessity and not of choice;" that the times were extraordinary, and that extraordinary measures must be resorted to in order to save our Government and preserve our nationality. (Speech of Spaulding, of New York; Cong. Globe, 1861-'62, Part 1, 523.) Other members of the House frankly confessed their doubt as to its constitutionality, but yielded their support of it under the pressure of this supposed necessity.

In the Senate also the measure was pressed for the same reasons. When the act was reported by the Committee on Finance, its chairman, whilst opposing the legal-tender provision, said: "It is put on the ground of absolute, overwhelming necessity; that the Government has now arrived at that point when it must have funds, and those funds are not to be obtained from ordinary sources, or from any of the expedients to which we have heretofore had recourse, and, therefore, this new, anomalous, and remarkable provision must be resorted to in order to enable the Government to pay off the debt that it now owes and afford circulation which will be available for other purposes." (Congressional Globe, 1861-'62, part 1, 764.) And upon that ground the provision was adopted, some of the Senators stating that in the exigency then existing money must be had, and they, therefore, sustained the measure, although they apprehended danger from the experiment. "The medicine of the Constitution," said Senator Sumner, "must not become its daily food." (Id., 800.) A similar necessity was urged upon the State tribunals and this court in justification of the measure, when its validity was questioned.

The dissenting opinion in Hepburn vs. Griswold, referred to the pressure that was upon the Government at the time to enable it to raise and support an army and to provide and maintain a navy. Chief-Justice Chase, who gave the prevailing opinion in that case, also spoke of the existence of the feeling when the bill was passed that the provision was necessary. He favored the provision on that ground when Secretary of the Treasury, although he had come to that conclusion with reluctance, and recommended its adoption by Congress. When the question as to its validity reached this court, this expression of favor was referred to, and by many it was supposed that it would control his judicial action. But after long pondering upon the subject, after listening to repeated arguments by able counsel, he decided against the constitutionality of the provision; and, holding in his hands the casting vote, he determined the judgment of the court. He thus preferred to preserve his integrity as a judicial officer rather than his consistency as a statesman. In his opinion he thus referred to his previous views:

"It is not surprising that amid the tumult of the late civil war, and under the influence of apprehensions for the safety of the Republic almost universal, different views, never before entertained by American statesmen or jurists, were adopted by many. The time was not favorable to considerate reflection upon the constitutional limits of legislative or executive authority. If power was assumed from patriotic motives, the assumption found ready justification in patriotic hearts. Many who doubted yielded their doubts, many who did not doubt were silent. Some who were strongly averse to making Government notes a legal tender felt themselves constrained to acquiesce in the views of the advocates of the measure. Not a few who then insisted upon its necessity, or acquiesced in that view, have since the return of peace and under the influence of the calmer time reconsidered their conclusions, and now concur in those which we have just announced. These conclusions seem to us to be fully sanctioned by the letter and spirit of the Constitution." (8 Wall, 625.)

It must be evident, however, upon reflection that if there were any power in the Government of the United States to impart the quality of legal tender to its promissory notes, it was for Congress to determine when the necessity for its exercise existed; that war merely increased the urgency for money; it did not add to the powers of the Government nor change their nature; that if the power existed it might be equally exercised when a loan was made to meet ordinary expenses in time of peace as when vast sums were needed to support an army or a navy in time of war. The wants of the Government could never be the measure of its powers. But in the excitement and apprehensions of the war these considerations were unheeded; the measure was passed as one of overruling necessity in a perilous crisis of the country. Now it is no longer advocated as one of necessity but as one that may be adopted at any time. Never before was it contended by any jurist or commentator on the Constitution that the Government, in full receipt of ample income, with a Treasury overflowing, with more money on hand than it knows what to do with, could issue paper money as a legal tender. What was in 1862 called the "medicine of the Constitution" has now become its daily bread. So it always happens that whenever a wrong principle of conduct, political or personal, is adopted on a plea of necessity, it will be afterward followed on a plea of convenience.

The advocates of the measure have not been consistent in the designation of the power upon which they have supported its validity, some placing it on the power to borrow money, some on the coining power, and some have claimed it as an incident to the general powers of the Government. In the present case it is placed by the court upon the power to borrow money, and the alleged sovereignty of the United States over the currency. It is assumed that this power, when exercised by the Government, is something different from what it is when exercised by corporations or individuals, and that the Government has, by the legal-tender provision, the power to enforce loans of money because the sovereign governments of European countries have claimed and exercised such power. "The words to borrow money," says the court, "are not to receive that limited and restricted interpretation and meaning which they would have in a penal statute or in an authority conferred by law or by contract upon trustees or agents for private purposes." And it adds that "the power, as incident to the power of borrowing money and issuing bills or notes of the Government for money borrowed, of impressing upon those bills or notes the quality of being a legal-tender for the payment of private debts, was a power universally understood to belong to sovereignty, in Europe and America, at the time of the framing and adoption of the Constitution of the United States. The governments of Europe, acting through the monarch or the legislature, according to the distribution of powers under their respective constitutions, had and have as sovereign a power of issuing paper money as of stamping coin," and that "the exercise of this power not being prohibited to Congress by the Constitution, it is included in the power expressly granted to borrow money on the credit of the United States."

As to the terms to borrow money, where, I would ask, does the court find any authority for giving to them a different interpretation in the Constitution from what they receive when used in other instruments, as in the charters of municipal bodies or of private corporations, or in the contracts of individuals? They are not ambiguous; they have a well-settled meaning in other instruments. If the court may change that in the Constitution, so it may the meaning of all other clauses; and the powers which the Government may exercise will be found declared, not by plain words in the organic law, but by words of a new significance resting in the minds of the judges. Until some authority beyond the alleged claim and practice of the sovereign governments of Europe be produced, I must believe that the terms have the same meaning in all instruments wherever they are used; that they mean a power only to contract for a loan of money upon considerations to be agreed between the parties. The conditions of the loan, or whether any particular security shall be given to the lender, are matters of arrangement between the parties; they do not concern any one else. They do not imply that the borrower can give to his promise to refund the money any security to the lender outside of property or rights which he possesses. The transaction is completed when the lender parts with his money and the borrower gives his promise to pay at the time and in the manner and with the securities agreed upon.

Whatever stipulations may be made, to add to the value of the promise or to secure its fulfillment, must necessarily be limited to the property, rights, and privileges which the borrower possesses. Whether he can add to his promises any element which will induce others to receive them beyond the security which he gives for their payment, depends upon his power to control such element. If he has a right to put a limitation upon the use of other persons' property, or to enforce an exaction of some benefit from them, he may give such privilege to the lender; but if he has no right thus to interfere with the property or possessions of others, of course he can give none. It will hardly be pretended that the Government of the United States has any power to enter into an engagement that, as security for its notes, the lender shall have special privileges with respect to the visible property of others, shall be able to occupy a portion of their lands or their houses, and thus interfere with the possession and use of their property. If the Government can not do that, how can it step in and say, as a condition of loaning money, that the lender shall have a right to interfere with contracts between private parties?

A large proportion of the property of the world exists in contracts, and the Government has no more right to deprive one of their value by legislation operating directly upon them, than it has a right to deprive one of the value of any visible and tangible property. No one, I think, will pretend that individuals or corporations possess the power to impart to their evidences of indebtedness any quality by which the holder will be able to affect the contracts of other parties, strangers to the loan; nor would any one pretend that Congress possesses the power to impart any such quality to the notes of the United States, except from the clause authorizing it to make laws necessary and proper to the execution of its powers. That clause, however, does not enlarge the expressly designated powers; it merely states what Congress could have done without its insertion in the Constitution. Without it Congress could have adopted any appropriate means to borrow; but that can only be appropriate for that purpose which has some relation of fitness to the end, which has respect to the terms essential to the contract, or to the securities which the borrower may furnish for the repayment of the loan. The quality of legal tender does not touch the terms of the contract; that is complete without it; nor does it stand as a security for the loan, for a security is a thing pledged, over which the borrower has some control, or in which he holds some interest.

The argument presented by the advocates of legal tender is, in substance, this: The object of borrowing is to raise funds; the addition of the quality of legal tender to the notes of the Government will induce parties to take them, and funds will thereby be more readily loaned. But the same thing may be said of the addition of any other quality which would give to the holder of the notes some advantage over the property of others, as, for instance, that the notes should serve as a pass on the public conveyances of the country, or as a ticket to places of amusement, or should exempt his property from State and municipal taxation or entitle him to the free use of the telegraph lines, or to a percentage from the revenues of private corporations. The same consequence, a ready acceptance of the notes, would follow; and yet no one would pretend that the addition of privileges of this kind with respect to the property of others, over which the borrower has no control, would be in any sense an appropriate measure to the execution of the power to borrow.

Undoubtedly the power to borrow includes the power to give evidences of the loan in bonds, treasury notes, or in such other form as may be agreed between the parties. These may be issued in such amounts as will fit them for circulation, and for that purpose may be made payable to bearer, and transferable by delivery. Experience has shown that the form best fitted to secure their ready acceptance is that of notes payable to bearer, in such amounts as may suit the ability of the lender. The Government, in substance, says to parties with whom it deals: lend us your money, or furnish us with your products or your labor, and we will ultimately pay you, and as evidence of it we will give you our notes, in such form and amount as may suit your convenience, and enable you to transfer them; we will also receive them for certain demands due to us. In all this matter there is only a dealing between the Government and the individuals who trust it. The transaction concerns no others. The power which authorizes it is a very different one from a power to deal between parties to private contracts in which the Government is not interested, and to compel the receipt of these promises to pay in place of the money for which the contracts stipulated. This latter power is not an incident to the former; it is a distinct and far greater power. There is no legal connection between the two; between the power to borrow from those willing to lend and the power to interfere with the independent contracts of others. The possession of this latter power would justify the interference of the Government with any rights of property of other parties, under the pretense that its allowance to the holders of the notes would lead to their more ready acceptance, and thus furnish the needed means.

The power vested in Congress to coin money does not in my judgment fortify the position of the court as its opinion affirms. So far from deducting from that power any authority to impress the notes of the Government with the quality of legal tender, its existence seems to me inconsistent with a power to make anything but coin a legal tender. The meaning of the terms "to coin money" is not at all doubtful. It is to mould metallic substances into forms convenient for circulation and to stamp them with the impress of the Government authority indicating their value with reference to the unit of value established by law. Coins are pieces of metal of definite weight and value, stamped such by the authority of the Government. If any doubt could exist that the power has reference to metallic substances only it would be removed by the language which immediately follows, authorizing Congress to regulate the value of money thus coined and of foreign coin, and also by clauses making a distinction between coin and the obligations of the General Government and of the States. Thus, in the clause authorizing Congress "to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States," a distinction is made between the obligations and the coin of the Government.

Money is not only a medium of exchange, but it is a standard of value. Nothing can be such standard which has not intrinsic value, or which is subject to frequent changes in value. From the earliest period in the history of civilized nations we find pieces of gold and silver used as money. These metals are scattered over the world in small quantities; they are susceptible of division, capable of easy impression, have more value in proportion to weight and size, and are less subject to loss by wear and abrasion than any other material possessing these qualities. It requires labor to obtain them; they are not dependent upon legislation or the caprices of the multitude; they can not be manufactured or decreed into existence, and they do not perish by lapse of time. They have, therefore, naturally, if not necessarily, become throughout the world a standard of value. In exchange for pieces of them products requiring an equal amount of labor are readily given. When the product and the piece of metal represent the same labor, or an approximation to it, they are freely exchanged. There can be no adequate substitute for these metals. Says Mr. Webster, in a speech made in the House of Representatives in 1815:

"The circulating medium of a commercial community must be that which is also the circulating medium of other commercial communities, or must be capable of being converted into that medium without loss. It must also be able not only to pass in payments and receipts among individuals of the same society and nation, but to adjust and discharge the balance of exchanges between different nations. It must be something which has a value abroad as well as at home, by which foreign as well as domestic debts can be satisfied. The precious metals alone answer these purposes. They alone, therefore, are money, and whatever else is to perform the functions of money must be their representative, and capable of being turned into them at will. So long as bank paper retains this quality it is a substitute for money; divested of this, nothing can give it that character." (Webster's Works, volume 3, 41.) The clause to coin money must be read in connection with the prohibition upon the States to make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts. The two taken together clearly show that the coins to be fabricated under the authority of the General Government, and as such to be a legal tender for debts, are to be composed principally if not entirely of the metals of gold and silver. Coins of such metals are necessarily a legal tender to the amount of their respective values without any legislative enactment, and the statute of the United States providing that they shall be such tender is only declaratory of their effect when offered in payment.

When the Constitution says, therefore, that Congress shall have the power to coin money, interpreting that clause with the prohibition upon the States, it says it shall have the power to make coins of the precious metals a legal tender, for that alone which is money can be a legal tender. If this be the true import of the language, nothing else can be made a legal tender. We all know that the value of the notes of the Government, in the market and in the commercial world generally, depends upon their convertibility on demand into coin; and as confidence in such convertibility increases or diminishes, so does the exchangeable value of the notes vary. So far from becoming themselves standards of value by reason of the legislative declaration to that effect, their own value is measured by the facility with which they can be exchanged into that which alone is regarded as money by the commercial world. They are promises of money, but they are not money in the sense of the Constitution. The term money is used in that instrument in several clauses: in the one authorizing Congress to "borrow money;" in the one authorizing Congress to "coin money;" in the one declaring that "no money" shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and in the one declaring that no State shall "coin money." And it is a settled rule of interpretation that the same term occurring in different parts of the same instrument shall be taken in the same sense, unless there is something in the context indicating that a different meaning was intended. Now, to coin money is, as I have said, to make coins out of metallic substances, and the only money the value of which Congress can regulate is coined money, either of our mints or of foreign countries. It should seem, therefore, that to borrow money is to obtain a loan of coined money, that is, money composed of the precious metals, representing value in the purchase of property and payment of debts. Between the promises of the Government, designated as its securities, and this money the Constitution draws a distinction, which disappears in the opinion of the court.

The opinion not only declares that it is in the power of Congress to make the notes of the Government a legal tender and a standard of value, but that under the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof Congress may issue coins of the same denominations as those now already current, but of less intrinsic value, by reason of containing a less weight of the precious metals, and thereby enable debtors to discharge their debts by payment of coins of less real value. This doctrine is put forth as in some way a justification of the legislation authorizing the tender of nominal money in place of real money in payment of debts. Undoubtedly Congress has power to alter the value of coins issued, either by increasing or diminishing the alloy they contain; so it may alter at its pleasure their denominations; it may hereafter call a dollar an eagle, and it may call an eagle a dollar. But if it be intended to assert that Congress can make the coins changed the equivalent of those having a greater value in their previous condition, and compel parties contracting for the latter to receive coins with diminished value, I must be permitted to deny any such authority. Any such declaration on its part would be not only utterly inoperative in fact but a shameful disregard of its constitutional duty.

As I said on a former occasion: "The power to coin money, as declared by this court, is a great trust devolved upon Congress, carrying with it the duty of creating and maintaining a uniform standard of value throughout the Union, and it would be a manifest abuse of this trust to give to the coins issued by its authority any other than their real value. By debasing the coins, when once the standard is fixed, is meant giving to the coins, by their form and impress, a certificate of their having a relation to that standard different from that which, in truth, they possess; in other words, giving to the coins a false certificate of their value. Arbitrary and profligate governments have often resorted to this miserable scheme of robbery, which Mill designates as a shallow and impudent artifice, the 'least covert of all modes of knavery, which consists in calling a shilling a pound, that a debt of one hundred pounds may be canceled by the payment of one hundred shillings.'" No such debasement has ever been attempted in this country, and none ever will be so long as any sentiment of honor influences the governing power of the nation. The changes from time to time in the quantity of alloy in the different coins has been made to preserve the proper relative value between gold and silver, or to prevent exportation, and not with a view of debasing them. Whatever power may be vested in the Government of the United States, it has none to perpetrate such monstrous iniquity. One of the great purposes of its creation, as expressed in the preamble of the Constitution, was the establishment of justice, and not a line nor a word is found in that instrument which sanctions any intentional wrong to the citizen, either in war or in peace.

But beyond and above all the objections which I have stated to the decision recognizing a power in Congress to impart the legal-tender quality to the notes of the Government is my objection to the rule of construction adopted by the court to reach its conclusions, a rule which fully carried out would change the whole nature of our Constitution and break down the barriers which separate a government of limited from one of unlimited powers. When the Constitution came before the conventions of the several States for adoption apprehension existed that other powers than those designated might be claimed, and it led to the first ten amendments. When these were presented to the States they were preceded by a preamble stating that the conventions of a number of the States had at the time of adopting the Constitution expressed a desire, "in order to prevent misconception or abuse of its powers, that further declaratory and restrictive clauses should be added." One of them is found in the tenth amendment, which declares that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

The framers of the Constitution, as I have said, were profoundly impressed with the evils which had resulted from the vicious legislation of the States making notes a legal tender, and they determined that such a power should not exist any longer. They therefore prohibited the States from exercising it, and they refused to grant it to the new government which they created. Of what purpose is it, then, to refer to the exercise of the power by the absolute or the limited governments of Europe, or by the States previous to our Constitution? Congress can exercise no power by virtue of any supposed inherent sovereignty in the General Government. Indeed, it may be doubted whether the power can be correctly said to appertain to sovereignty in any proper sense as an attribute of an independent political community. The power to commit violence, perpetrate injustice, take private property by force without compensation to the owner, and compel the receipt of promises to pay in place of money may be exercised, as it often has been, by irresponsible authority, but it can not be considered as belonging to a government founded upon law. But be that as it may, there is no such thing as a power of inherent sovereignty in the Government of the United States. It is a government of delegated powers, supreme within its prescribed sphere, but powerless outside of it.

In this country sovereignty resides in the people, and Congress can exercise no power which they have not by their Constitution intrusted to it; all else is withheld. It seems, however, to be supposed that as the power was taken from the States, it could not have been intended that it should disappear entirely, and therefore it must in some way adhere to the General Government, notwithstanding the tenth amendment and the nature of the Constitution. The doctrine that a power not expressly forbidden may be exercised would, as I have observed, change the character of our Government. If I have read the Constitution aright, if there is any weight to be given to the uniform teachings of our great jurists and of commentators previous to the late civil war, the true doctrine is the very opposite of this. If the power is not in terms granted, and is not necessary and proper for the exercise of a power which is thus granted, it does not exist. And in determining what measures may be adopted in executing the powers granted Chief-Justice Marshall declares that they must be appropriate, plainly adapted to the end, not prohibited, and consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution. Now, all through that instrument we find limitations upon the power, both of the General Government and the State governments, so as to prevent oppression and injustice. No legislation, therefore, tending to promote either can consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution. A law which interferes with the contracts of others, and compels one of the parties to receive in satisfaction something different from that stipulated, without reference to its actual value in the market, necessarily works such injustice and wrong.

There is, it is true, no provision in the Constitution of the United States forbidding in direct terms the passing of laws by Congress impairing the obligation of contracts, and there are many express powers conferred, such as the power to declare war, levy duties, and regulate commerce, the exercise of which affects more or less the value of contracts. Thus war necessarily suspends intercourse between the citizens or subjects of belligerent nations and the performance during its continuance of previous contracts. The imposition of duties upon goods may affect the prices of articles imported or manufactured so as to materially alter the value of previous contracts respecting them. But these incidental consequences arising from the exercise of such powers were contemplated in the grant of them. As there can be no solid objection to legislation under them, no just complaint can be made of such consequences. But far different is the case when the impairment of the contract does not follow incidentally, but is directly and in terms allowed and enacted. Legislation operating directly upon private contracts, changing their conditions, is forbidden to the States, and no power to alter the stipulations of such contracts by direct legislation is conferred upon Congress.

There are also many considerations, outside of the fact that there is no grant of the power, which show that the framers of the Constitution never intended that such power should be exercised. One of the great objects of the Constitution, as already observed, was to establish justice, and what was meant by that in its relations to contracts, as said by the late Chief-Justice in his opinion in Hepburn vs. Griswold, was not left to inference or conjecture. And in support of this statement he refers to the fact that when the Constitution was undergoing discussion in the convention, the Congress of the Confederation was engaged in framing the ordinance for the government of the Northwest Territory, in which certain articles of compact were established between the people of the original States and the people of the territory "for the purposes," as expressed in the instrument, "of extending the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty, whereon these republics [the States united under the Confederation], their laws, and constitutions are erected." That Congress was also alive to the evils which the loose legislation of the States had created by interfering with the obligation of private contracts and making notes a legal tender for debts; and the ordinance declared that in the just preservation of rights and property no law "ought ever to be made, or have force in the said territory, that shall in any manner whatever interfere with or affect private contracts, or engagements, bona fide and without fraud previously formed."

This principle, said the Chief-Justice, found more condensed expression in the prohibition upon the States against impairing the obligation of contracts, which has always been recognized "as an efficient safeguard against injustice;" and the court was then of opinion that "it is clear that those who framed and those who adopted the Constitution intended that the spirit of this prohibition should pervade the entire body of legislation, and that the justice which the Constitution was ordained to establish was not thought by them to be compatible with legislation of an opposite tendency." Soon after the Constitution was adopted the case of Calder vs. Bull came before this court, and it was there said that there were acts which the Federal and State Legislatures could not do without exceeding their authority; and among them was mentioned a law which punished a citizen for an innocent act, and a law which destroyed or impaired the lawful private contracts of citizens. "It is against all reason and justice," it was added, "for a people to intrust a Legislature with such powers, and, therefore, it can not be presumed that they have done it." (3 Dallas, 388.) And Mr. Madison, in one of the articles in the Federalist, declared that laws impairing the obligation of contracts were contrary to the first principles of the social compact and to every principle of sound legislation. Yet this court holds that a measure directly operating upon and necessarily impairing private contracts may be adopted in the execution of powers specifically granted for other purposes, because it is not in terms prohibited, and that it is consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution.

From the decision of the court I see only evil likely to follow. There have been times within the memory of all of us when the legal-tender notes of the United States were not exchangeable for more than one-half of their nominal value. The possibility of such depreciation will always attend paper money. This inborn infirmity no mere legislative declaration can cure. If Congress has the power to make the notes a legal tender and to pass as money or its equivalent, why should not a sufficient amount be issued to pay the bonds of the United States as they mature? Why pay interest on the millions of dollars of bonds now due, when Congress can in one day make the money to pay the principal? And why should there be any restraint upon unlimited appropriations by the Government for all imaginary schemes of public improvement, if the printing-press can furnish the money that is needed for them?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado has fourteen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. BELFORD. I yield that time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. CHACE was recognized.

Mr. CASSIDY. I will yield if the gentleman from Ohio desires further time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I should be glad to answer one question.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] is recognized.

Mr. CASSIDY. I desire to yield some additional time to the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is now speaking in the time of the gentleman from Rhode Island, who has the floor and the right to proceed if he desires.

Mr. CHACE. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman from Rhode Island yield so that the gentleman from Nevada can yield me five minutes of his time?

Mr. CHACE. I should be glad to do so——

Mr. CASSIDY. Not of the time of the gentleman from Rhode Island, but if he will yield the floor for five minutes I will yield the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nevada, of course, can not take the gentleman from Rhode Island off the floor.

Mr. CASSIDY. Except by his consent.

The SPEAKER. Except by his consent.

Mr. CASSIDY. I was appealing to him to allow me to yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, after which he could resume the floor and proceed in his own time.

Mr. CHACE. I have no objection myself, but I perceive that the House is beginning to tire of this discussion. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY].

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire for a moment to call back the attention of the House to the bill which is before us. This is a proposition to authorize the retirement of the trade-dollars that may be in circulation in this country.

There seems to be no difference of opinion, Mr. Speaker, among the members of this House as to the propriety, under all the circumstances, of the Government's retiring the trade-dollars that may be in this country. The sole difference of opinion that has risen has been upon the fourth section of the bill, which provides:

SEC. 4. That the trade-dollars so received at the coinage mints shall be regarded and treated as silver bullion, and, at their bullion value, shall be deducted from the amount of bullion required to be purchased and coined by the act of February 28, 1878.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] objects to that section because the trade-dollars which are so received are to be treated as silver bullion, and will, under this provision of the bill, be reckoned and counted as part of the monthly purchases of silver bullion to be coined under existing law. He desires to strike out that section, in order that the silver bullion which is purchased in the form of trade-dollars may be coined into additional standard silver dollars to those now required by law.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Missouri, upon a bill of this character, designed neither to diminish nor to enlarge the coinage of the standard silver dollars, but simply to retire the trade-dollars—retire them as bullion—I say it seems to me the gentleman asks that which is unreasonable. This House, I take it, is ready to retire the trade-dollars, provided it is to be a simple retirement, and treatment of these trade-dollars as silver bullion. But if there is to go into this bill, as suggested by the gentleman from Missouri, a proposition to increase the coinage of standard silver dollars to the extent of the silver bullion that may be purchased in the form of trade-dollars, then there is forced upon the House a new question, namely: Will this House consent to the enlargement of the coinage of the standard silver dollars?

The gentleman affects to consider this proposition as introduced by the committee as something remarkable. But I wish to call his attention to the fact that a bill precisely like the one which has been reported from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures was at the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, by a unanimous report of the committee, brought into the House, and that that bill after explanation to the House was passed by a unanimous vote on the 19th of June, 1882. Not a single member of that House, not even the gentleman from Missouri, discovered at that time——

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DINGLEY. For a correction, but not for a speech.

Mr. BLAND. The bill came from the Committee on Banking and Currency——

Mr. DINGLEY. Do you wish to correct my statement?

Mr. BLAND. I wish to say the bill was passed without consideration under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. DINGLEY. It was passed in this House after an explanation at length by several gentlemen, and not a single member of the House—all, as I take it for granted, thoroughly and intelligently understanding its provisions—objected to it.

Now, while I am ready to pass the bill as reported by the committee, a bill which neither enlarges nor diminishes the coinage of standard silver dollars, I can not consent, as much as I desire these bastard trade-dollars to be retired—I can not consent, if the bill shall be placed in such a condition as that, to indirectly vote for an increase of the coinage of standard silver dollars, and I do not think it is right upon a bill of this character to attempt to foist in an amendment the practical effect of which would be to increase the coinage of those dollars. I object, Mr. Speaker, to the coinage of those dollars.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DINGLEY. I have but a few moments and have not time to yield.

I say I object to the coinage of those dollars, because the number already coined and to-day in the Treasury of the United States is larger than the people of this country desire to use. I am willing to coin as many of those dollars as the people of this country desire to use, but I do object to taking the money of this Government, to taking the gold that may be there from the Treasury of the nation, and using that to buy any product to be coined, even into standard silver dollars, to be piled up in the Treasury, when nobody wants them.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not raise that question at this present time. I simply say to gentlemen I am willing, so far as this bill is concerned, to leave that matter as it stands now. But I am not willing to have an amendment foisted upon this bill that will increase the coinage of standard silver dollars.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman just permit a statement?

Mr. DINGLEY. I have but a moment.

Mr. BRUMM. It will only take a moment to correct the gentleman.

Mr. DINGLEY. Very well.

Mr. BRUMM. You say this bill will neither increase nor diminish the coinage. But will it not practically diminish the volume of currency?

Mr. DINGLEY. Not at all. The trade-dollars are not in circulation to-day and are not a part of the volume of the circulating medium. They have been retired from the circulating medium as such and are in the hands of private holders, whosoever they may be. Therefore I say the proposition to strike out the fourth section is practically a proposition to increase the coinage of standard silver dollars in this country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say, addressing myself to the other question which has been discussed, that I for one believe in the use of both gold and silver in the full legal-tender coinage of this country. But I say to gentlemen you never can successfully use both metals unless they are coined at a bullion value which shall be equivalent, and then, and then only, can you secure the full circulation of silver.

Mr. CHACE. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT].

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I agree with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] in his proposition that this House shall not sanction by any act the increase of the coinage of the standard silver dollar. But I go further than the gentleman from Maine. I think the time has come when this House should put its seal of condemnation upon the coinage of one single additional standard dollar. My friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] has achieved, I was going to say immortality, but certainly great renown, by having identified himself with a measure which according to his view has made 85 cents' worth of silver equivalent in value to $1. He has done that by act of Congress, and he has done it on the principle of lifting ourselves by our shoulder-straps. Such experiments must always fail. If they could succeed, then my friend from Missouri has discovered the philosopher's stone, which would enable us hereafter to dispense with all human efforts and to provide ourselves with all the comforts and luxuries of life by a simple act of Congress.

The gentleman from Missouri now comes into the House with another proposition, which suggests the old nursery rhyme of Mother Goose:

There was a man in our town
And he was wondrous wise,
He jumped into a bramble bush
And scratched out both his eyes;

And when he found his eyes were out,
With all his might and main
He jumped into another bush,
And scratched them in again.

[Laughter.]

The proposition which the gentleman now makes to this House is the proposition of free coinage for silver. By the restricted coinage which goes on under his bill of $2,000,000 per month the Government is making on paper, as he said, $300,000 of profit per month. By opening the mints to unrestricted coinage he would give up the nominal profit to the Government of $300,000 per month and transfer a real profit of 15 per cent. into the pockets of those who shall be fortunate enough to get in first through the open doors of the Mint with their silver bullion. Now, Mr. Speaker, let us apply to this novel proposition the test of fact and of simple principle.

The unit of value by law in the United States is the gold dollar, weighing 25.8 grains.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. When was it made so?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am merely stating a fact, and in the time I have I do not wish to be interrupted. It was in 1854 that that was done. Now at 25.8 grains to the dollar an ounce of gold is worth $18.60. By law the relative coinage value of gold and silver is as one to sixteen. Therefore the coinage value of the ounce of silver is $1.16½. We are able to go into the market to buy an ounce of silver at $1.01, and, taking the average of the last year, we are buying it at a little less now than $1.01 per ounce.

What is the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri? That for the silver which we can buy in unlimited quantities in this or any other market in the world for 101 cents per ounce he would pay out of the Treasury of this nation 116½ cents per ounce. In other words, he would give to every man who brings an ounce of silver to be coined 15 cents more in coin than the market value of that silver and 15 cents more per ounce than it is or can be bought for by the Government for coining purposes.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I can not, for I have but a limited time.

Mr. BLAND. I am glad that I was more polite to the gentleman than he is to me.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will yield all my time to the gentleman.

Mr. BLAND. I do not want it.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will yield all my time.

Mr. BLAND. I yielded to the gentleman.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Yes; but the gentleman had an hour, while I have but fifteen minutes.

Mr. BLAND. I will not interrupt the gentleman.

RESULT OF FREE COINAGE.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The controversy is one of fact. What would happen? Of course all the world who are now trying to sell silver for 101 cents per ounce will come to our mints, where they could sell it for 116½ cents per ounce. It will be "the devil take the hindmost" in the rush to sell silver for 15 cents per ounce more than its market value.

And under his proposition the Government must take the silver and pay that rate for it. I suppose the gentleman from Missouri would provide a bullion fund for this purpose. Has he ever considered the magnitude of the bullion fund which would have to be provided? There is supposed to be in existence in the world $6,000,000,000 of silver, and the holders of the whole of that $6,000,000,000 would rush to our mints under the gentleman's proposition. And if we were to buy it all and keep the mints open, the bullion fund which we would have to provide would have to be on the scale of magnificence proportioned to so vast an operation. It would certainly provide an outlet at once for the idle and useless fund of $126,000,000 of silver dollars now stored at great expense in the Treasury.

But no such thing would happen; the limitation would be the coinage capacity of our mints. To the extent of the coinage capacity of our mints, which would probably not much if any exceed the silver production of this country, which is about $40,000,000 worth per annum, the Government would be giving 15 per cent. more than the market value of silver bullion in this or any other market in the world.

What is the next step? Every man who had thus received 116 cents per ounce for that which is worth in the markets of the world only 101 cents per ounce would hasten to put it into some form of useful value. First of all he would prefer gold, for gold will buy everything else in every market in the world. The consequence would be that the rush for gold would immediately raise it to a premium, and the limit of that premium will be just the difference in the bullion value of silver and gold. In other words, the premium would be 15 per cent., because, as everybody knows, gold and silver are dealt in by the money-brokers all over the world on a margin of one-eighth of 1 per cent.

Then, when gold went up to a premium, the next rush would be to buy commodities with silver dollars on the old standard of values, and the price of commodities would all advance. They are bought and sold to-day at gold value, but the price would then advance with the premium on gold, and they would thereafter be sold at silver values. In other words, all the necessaries of life would be rapidly advanced until they would purchase as much gold as they did before the premium existed.

WAGES OF LABOR.

Then the workingman who receives his wage of one or two dollars per day, as the case may be, and to whom the rise always comes last and sometimes never comes, would be compelled to buy his supplies at 15 per cent. advance. This measure, therefore, would operate as a deduction from the wages of labor of just 15 per cent.

Then what next would happen? I shall be told that this proposition would enable the poor man to pay his debts at 15 per cent. deduction from what he had agreed to pay; that this is sound in principle and a most beneficent feature of the plan. In resisting it I shall be told that I represent the capitalistic class and am the organ of Wall street. Now, the rich man knows how to take care of himself. The poor man does not know and can not know how to take care of himself, and we are sent here as far as possible to take care of him, and it is for that reason I strive to-day to expose the fallacy of a proposition which can only have the effect of making the rich richer and the poor poorer.

I resist, then, this proposition of the gentleman from Missouri, because, in the first place, it would rob the poor man of 15 per cent. of his present wages, measured by its purchasing power; and in the next place it would rob him of 15 per cent. of the hard earnings which he has saved against a rainy day. The rich men hold property which would rise in value with the premium on gold. They hold bonds of railroad companies, which by the letter of the contract are made payable in gold.

SAVINGS OF THE PEOPLE.

But all debts not payable in gold would be solvable in silver. Where are those debts and to whom do they belong? The great lenders of this country are the savings-banks, the mutual insurance companies, and the incorporated companies which hold in trust the savings of the poor and the earnings of labor. Their loans are made payable in lawful money, and will be paid off in the depreciated silver which will follow its free and unlimited coinage, for in the end the silver coins can have no greater value than the market price of the bullion from which they are coined.

Therefore when this depreciation of 15 per cent. takes place all the loans made by savings-banks, trust companies, and mutual insurance companies, amounting to more than $100,000,000, representing the earnings of professional men who live upon salaries, the savings of clerks, the sole provision for widows and orphans would be payable in silver, to the loss in my city and in my district of millions of dollars laboriously saved by the most deserving classes of the community, and who, since the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the Legal-tender case, have no other protection than in the wisdom of Congress.

I represent a district in which there are but few capitalists. I represent 150,000 people who earn their daily bread by their daily labor. They are an industrious and saving constituency. Their money is in the savings-banks of the city of New York. You will be astonished to know it, but in the State of New York over $500,000,000 of the savings of these people are to-day loaned out to be paid back in the money of the land. If that money be depreciated 15 per cent., then the people will lose 15 per cent. of all their accumulated earnings. And this depreciation is only the beginning of the downward course in the value of silver. The commercial world has outgrown the use of silver as a necessary tool of commerce. Gold and paper instruments of exchange have taken its place. They are better and cheaper tools of trade. Silver is relegated to its proper place as a convenient subsidiary money, of which the intrinsic value is of no consequence so long as there is local redemption for it within the area where it circulates.

But gold pays international balances, and is and will remain the sole standard of value in the great markets of the world. Hence, Mr. Speaker, I oppose the whole proposition of the gentleman to open our mints to the free coinage of silver, for the reason that thereby the nation would lose at once 15 per cent. on all the silver which would flow into this country from foreign countries now earnestly seeking an opportunity to get rid of the heavy load of silver which weighs them down and embarrasses their finances. In the Bank of France alone there are $200,000,000 seeking a market. The German Government stopped the sale of its silver when it went below 55 pence to the ounce, and is waiting a chance to unload another one hundred millions on anybody that will buy it.

But outside of these countries, whence I have heard it said on this floor silver could not come because "the people of this country were not such fools as to buy the worthless stuff"—outside of these countries are India and China, the sinks of silver for more than two thousand years. In these countries gold is already at a premium of 15 per cent. as compared with silver; and men who could bring silver from India to this country and convert it into gold, as the gentleman from Missouri would allow them to do by his proposition for free coinage, would of course make all speed to gather up from all quarters the vast fund of silver in those countries, and dump it down upon the people of this land, where the loss will fall upon the laboring classes, who, unless we interpose for their benefit, will be helpless to protect themselves.

Gentlemen who flatter themselves that the silver of the world will not seek the market where bullion fetches the highest price deliberately shut their eyes to the inexorable laws of trade. Silver circulates in France at the ratio of 15½ to 1 of gold only because there is no coinage of silver by the Latin Union. This coinage was suspended simply to avoid the depreciation of silver coins to the bullion value, which would otherwise have taken place. Give it a market at more than its bullion value, and it will be replaced with gold as surely as the air rushes into a vacuum.

The depreciation of our silver coins, Mr. Speaker, would occur at once if the mints were now opened to the free coinage of silver. What would occur at once in that event is just as sure to occur, if you allow time enough, under the limited coinage act of $2,000,000 a month. This depreciation will be the slow but sure work of the monster steadily digging away at the foundations of the wealth and prosperity of this country, so that in a little while we shall be brought to the silver basis; and then all the consequences I have predicted will occur just as certainly as if the gentleman were able to carry out his plan of free coinage at once. In that proposition he is perfectly logical. If we are to go on with the coinage of silver at all, the unlimited coinage which the gentleman proposes is the only defensible position and ought to be put into effect, if it were not for the disastrous consequences which would send a flood of ruin over this land.

But, as I have said, those consequences are unavoidable, whether we continue the limited coinage or institute the free coinage of silver. Twice in my life have I witnessed the transfer in this country of vast masses of wealth from the possession of those who have created it, to the ownership of those who were shrewd or fortunate enough to profit by the situation. Once was when the legal-tender act was passed and creditors were forced to take 40 cents in payment of 100 cents, which was their just due. Again, when the resumption of specie payment took place in 1879, persons who had borrowed 40 cents were forced to pay the debt with 100 cents. No tongue can describe the ruin and the misery caused by this wholesale transfer of property, the wrecks of which still survive in every State in this Union. It is because I hope to be spared the sad spectacle of another such unjust and uncalled-for reversal of the laws which ought to govern the acquisition and transfer of property, that I oppose, and shall oppose, the degradation of the standard of value, whereby one class of the community, and the most deserving as it is the most helpless class, is pillaged by law for the benefit of those who live by the sweat and toil of their less fortunate and more confiding fellowmen. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CHACE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. YORK].

Mr. YORK. Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes allowed me on this question I wish to say in the outset that I desire to add my mite to the passage of this bill, for the simple reason that I believe it will protect the poor and laboring people of this country. I wish to see the trade-dollar retired and the standard dollar in its place. The Government in the outset issued these trade-dollars to the people for 100 cents in the dollar; but the Government has not kept faith with the people. The speculator has stepped in between the Government and the people; and thus the value of the trade-dollar has been depreciated in the hands of the people to 85 cents. By this depreciation the laboring men, the poor people of the country, have been the sufferers. The Government should now step in for their relief; and hereafter, when the Government puts its stamp upon a dollar, whether of silver or gold or paper, I want it to be a dollar all over the land.

The rich man has his gold; he has his bonds; he has his paper money; but the money of the poor people of this country is the silver dollar. Hence the poorer classes of our people have suffered by the depreciation of the value of the trade-dollar.

We admit, Mr. Speaker, that the passage of this bill will give the speculator and the banker a large amount of ill-gotten gain that they ought not to have. They have bought up this money at 85 cents on the dollar, and the passage of this bill will make it worth 100 cents on the dollar. It is wrong that they should thus be benefited; but we see no way to avoid it if at the same time we do justice to the people of the country. If this bill should not pass, those same speculators and bankers would issue this currency again into the hands of the people; it would be again bought up; so that the laboring community are the sufferers all the way through.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know but that the bill would be improved by striking out the fourth section; but I shall feel it my duty to vote for the bill with the fourth section, because I believe this bill will give the relief the people of the country demand. I feel that the people of the country will be the sufferers so long as the trade-dollar is in existence, because there is no way in which we can prevent the bankers and speculators from imposing upon this class of people.

I believe that the paper circulation of the country is the best paper money the world has ever produced. I believe that the gold and silver of the country should circulate upon an equality. But we find that while the gold dollar circulates as worth 100 cents, the trade-dollar, one of the coins of the country, bearing the stamp of our Government, circulates among the people to-day for only 85 cents. I believe it to be the duty of the Government to call in this trade-dollar and to issue in its stead the standard silver dollar. I believe when this is done it will give stability to the currency all over the country, and the poor and the laboring people will be protected in their rights and interests, while the Government will simply do an act of justice.

In my section of the country, Mr. Speaker, many of the poor farmers have suffered by reason of the depreciation of this trade-dollar. Many who have taken it at 100 cents have been unable to spend it except at a discount, because the speculators and the bankers had circulated all over the land the statement that the trade-dollar was not a current coin, thus enabling themselves to buy it up at 85 cents on the dollar.

Mr. WELLER. Would you let them pay that back at 100 cents to the dollar?

Mr. YORK. That is the thing I wish to stop, and the passage of this bill is the only way it will be stopped.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. JOHNSON, its Chief Clerk, announcing the passage of the bill (H. R. 2334) to release the American Baptist Mission Society from the conditions of the sale of the marine-hospital building and grounds at Natchez, Miss., with an amendment; in which concurrence was requested.

It further announced the passage of joint resolution (H. Res. 210) requiring the Secretary of War to furnish copies of certain muster-rolls to the governor of the State of Ohio.

It further announced the passage of the following bills; in which concurrence was requested:

A bill (S. 1039) for the relief of the survivors of the exploring steamer Jeannette, and the widows and children of those who perished in the retreat from the wreck of that vessel in the Arctic seas; and

A bill (S. 1063) to amend the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

TRADE-DOLLAR.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the special order, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. CHACE. Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that the House is anxious to come to a vote on this bill, and therefore I shall not consume the balance of my time. I will confine myself entirely to the provisions of the bill, although I should have been glad to answer some of the statements and endeavored to controvert some of the errors which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] brought to view yesterday. He has seen fit to import into this discussion the silver question in its broadest phase. I wish now to call the House back to the provision of the pending bill.

We have in this country a most anomalous monetary system. We have, besides the subsidiary coin, six kinds of legal money: gold coin, which is full legal-tender; silver coin, which is full legal-tender; legal-tender notes, which are receivable for all dues, public and private, except duties and interest; gold certificates, which bear interest and occupy the same position as gold coin; silver certificates, which are receivable for public dues, but which by a strange provision ingrafted on the new banking law last year were made receivable in the settlement of clearing-house balances in the city of New York, an attempt on the part of those who favor the expansion of silver currency to force the silver certificates into circulation; then we have the national-bank note, which has a quasi legal-tender quality—it is receivable for excise taxes, for payment for public lands, and for all other dues to the United States except duties, and it is payable from the United States for salaries of employés of the Government and for debts due to individuals and corporations. And there is, besides, in the hands of the people this trade-dollar, which was made, as has been stated, a legal tender to the amount of $5 by accident. However that may be, the Government is responsible for the condition in which that coin is to-day, and it is an act of simple justice to the holders of it that it should be redeemed.

Gentlemen have said, why not make it a legal tender? There is every reason why it should not be made a legal tender. The coin of the Government should be of such character that every man, every woman, and every child should be able to distinguish it by the touch. Where is the man who can test it? What becomes of your test-scale? All over the land brokers and bankers and dealers have test-scales, one end to weigh and the other end to size. If you have two sizes and weights of a dollar, how are you to distinguish which is the real dollar?

I might go on, but it seems to me it can not be possible gentlemen will really think of putting out two kinds of dollars both with a legal-tender quality, one of 412½ grains and the other of 420 grains. Therefore I shall pass from that subject.

The gentleman from North Carolina asked a question, which I think has been answered three times in this debate, as to why we were in any danger respecting a large influx of this coin from China and the East. And this coin, instead of being attracted in considerable amounts, has not been procured by the brokers and bullion dealers of New York to any considerable extent, although they have been offering during the last three years 99 cents for it. That is satisfactory evidence to the mind of the Director of the Mint and to coin dealers and other gentlemen that all but the 7,000,000 which can be traced to this country, or at least the greater bulk of it, has been used in the manufacture of sycee-silver coin in China, or recoined in India, or else melted up in the arts.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman permit me to say that for the last three years these dollars have been exported instead of imported?

Mr. CHACE. But the movement has been inconsiderable. The only objection to this bill, Mr. Speaker, that has been urged so far is to this fourth section. Now let us examine that section for a moment. The present law provides that there shall be coined not less than two million dollars' worth of silver bullion each month into standard dollars and not more than $4,000,000 per month. This bill in no sense affects that provision of the law of 1878. It will not reduce the amount of coinage one dollar. It can not do it. The statement, therefore, of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] that that section would reduce the coinage of standard dollars is a mistake. It will not reduce the coinage.

Mr. BLAND. Let me say to the gentleman——

Mr. CHACE. I must decline to be interrupted.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman would not misrepresent me, I am sure.

Mr. CHACE. I have no intention of doing so, but I must decline to yield to the gentleman. I heard him say it myself. If he wishes to retract it, I will yield for that purpose but not for a speech.

Mr. BLAND. I said this——

Mr. CHACE. I heard the gentleman's speech.

Mr. BLAND. And the gentleman is mistaken in his inference.

Mr. CHACE. I saw it also in print. I saw it in the Republican of this city.

Mr. BLAND. Oh, well; I do not belong to that side of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHACE. That is very likely; but the reporters were listening, and I have no doubt that they made a correct report of what the gentleman said.

Mr. BLAND. What I said was this—but if you decline to yield to me, of course I can not correct the misapprehension.

Mr. CHACE. No, I can not yield now.

Mr. BLAND. I did not say what the gentleman says I did.

Mr. CHACE. Then the gentleman is not opposed to the fourth section?

Mr. BLAND. I am glad to say that I was more polite to that side of the House. There seems to be a disposition to put me down. What I said was, however, that the difference between striking out the fourth section and this bill as it is will be $10,000,000 more in circulation a year hence than to leave the section in; that is all.

Mr. CHACE. That is not what the gentleman said. That is something else that he said, and it is just as incorrect as the other. It will have no earthly effect one way or the other. It can not have any. The coinage will be just the same.

The law provides for the purchase of $2,000,000 a month of silver bullion for the coinage into the standard silver dollars, and this fourth section of this bill has no effect upon that law. The gentleman's statement, therefore, is contradictory and entirely erroneous. There is no such inference or effect to be drawn from this section. It is only an attempt on the part of the gentleman from Missouri to prejudice the minds of those who are in favor of bulling the silver market. That is all.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman pretend to say——

Mr. CHACE. I can not yield.

Now, on the other hand, let us see the effect of the gentleman's proposed amendment. We have, as I have said, this provision for the coinage of two millions in value of silver bullion, which will make $2,300,000. If his amendment passes, it increases that by just the amount of trade-dollars which are put into the mint each month. In other words, not satisfied with coining silver dollars here until you have piled up $166,000,000 in the Treasury, which the people refuse, which they spurn——

Mr. WELLER (from his seat). That is incorrect.

Mr. CHACE. And which they do not want, for you have been able to force upon the people only thirty-nine millions of the whole of it, yet you propose to go on and coin from seven to ten millions more in the same way.

Mr. BELFORD. Let me call attention to one fact which the gentleman seems to have overlooked. Is it not a fact that the men who hold gold in the city of New York within the last two months have come to this Treasury and demanded silver certificates, which the New York treasurer refused to give them?

Mr. CHACE. Oh, that is an absurd story.

Mr. BELFORD. Well, answer the question.

Mr. CHACE. It has been concocted for the purpose of influencing opinion. But I will answer the gentleman by saying that if the balance of trade continues adverse to us he will find, I apprehend, some difficulty in getting gold for his silver certificates.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is eminently conservative. Its provisions are of such a nature as to avoid any sudden change in the circulation. These dollars, being receivable for public dues, afford every holder an opportunity to redeem them without expense or loss. They go into the Treasury and into the bullion fund, making no disturbance and no appreciable effect upon the silver market. The two years' time obviates any hurry; and when the time arrives or the period is ended within which they are receivable, we shall have relieved the people of a coin foisted upon them without expense to the Government, without loss to any one, and will have done justice to all.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman permit me? Does the gentleman contend that this bill, with this section, the fourth section, in, will not contract the volume of money now existing?

Mr. CHACE. It will not contract it a dollar.

Mr. BRUMM. Now, let me ask you a question. If the First National Bank of Washington city has in its vaults one thousand trade-dollars placed there by its depositors, and your bill passes with the fourth section in, will not those trade-dollars be taken to the Treasury and melted without any increase of dollars to take their place?

Mr. CHACE. Why, certainly not. Standard dollars will be paid out for them.

Mr. BRUMM. But here are a thousand dollars deposited in the bank——

Mr. CHACE. But they are not in circulation.

Mr. BRUMM. Are they not in the volume?

Mr. CHACE. Not at all.

Mr. BRUMM. Unquestionably they are.

Mr. CHACE. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND].

Mr. POLAND. I had a theory on this subject of trade-dollars which was embodied in a proposed amendment I offered here. My only anxiety was to have the Government keep faith with the people and redeem the money it had put out. This bill of the committee comes so near to and accomplishes so much of what I wanted to accomplish, that I desire to say I will not press that amendment, but will vote for the previous question when called, and vote for the bill as it is.

Mr. WELLER addressed the Chair.

Mr. DOWD. I take the floor for the purpose of moving the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOWD] in charge of the bill moves the previous question.

Mr. BLAND. I understand if the previous question is ordered the amendment to strike out the fourth section will be pending.

Mr. DOWD. As to amendments, I have no power under the instruction of the committee to yield for any amendment except that of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], to strike out the fourth section. Before asking the Chair to put the question on ordering the previous question, as some gentlemen have been cut off from addressing the House, I hope unanimous consent will be given to all gentlemen who desire to do so to print remarks on this bill in the RECORD.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the demand for the previous question will be voted down.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from North Carolina whether it is understood that one amendment, and only one, will be entertained; and, if so, I inquire further by what authority that one is to be entertained and all others are to be excluded?

Mr. DOWD. By direction of the committee.

Mr. KASSON. I think I must object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOWD] ask unanimous consent that gentlemen who have not had an opportunity to address the House on this bill may have leave to print their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection to that? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LACEY. I hope the gentleman from North Carolina will permit this amendment to be considered as pending, to be added to the second section. I will read it:

Provided, That no trade-dollar which is chopped, defaced, or mutilated shall be received, exchanged, or redeemed under the provisions of this act.

Mr. MILLS. I hope an opportunity will be given to vote on all amendments.

Mr. DOWD. I will say the understanding of the committee was, and such was the opinion of the Director of the Mint, that no amendment such as that suggested by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LACEY] was necessary. Still I will accept that amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOWD] has called the previous question; and, having done so, he is not in a position to accept amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina demands the previous question on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] and on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman from North Carolina accepts my amendment.

The SPEAKER. In order to do so he must withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to inquire when the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] became pending in distinction from any others.

The SPEAKER. It was stated by the gentleman from North Carolina once or twice during the debate that the committee had instructed him to allow that amendment to be voted upon.

Mr. KASSON. But I submit to the Chair that that amendment is no more pending by the action of the House than any other amendment. I submit that that is not a matter within the option of one man.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is correct. Unless the gentleman from Missouri offered the amendment before the previous question was moved it is not covered by the previous question.

Mr. BLAND. When I proposed the amendment it was understood by the committee that I should offer it and I did.

The SPEAKER. The understanding in the committee can not control the proceedings of the House.

Mr. BLAND. I offered the amendment and the gentleman from North Carolina included it in his demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from North Carolina to demand the previous question and then to say that by instruction of the committee he would allow the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri to be offered. But the point is made that under the rules of the House an amendment can not be offered after the previous question is demanded. If the demand for the previous question is withdrawn it can then be offered.

Mr. LACEY. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LACEY. This amendment which I have offered was offered before the previous question was demanded. It was before the House just as much as the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

The SPEAKER. It could not be offered, because the House had not reached that stage in the consideration of the bill when it could be offered according to the practice prevailing here.

Mr. DOWD. I desire to say that I supposed the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri was pending. I understood him to say he had offered it.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair will state again that the House had not reached that stage in the consideration of the bill when an amendment was in order.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to submit a parliamentary question. This bill was being considered, not in Committee of the Whole, but in the House. And it was competent at any time during the discussion to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that according to the usual practice when gentlemen obtained the floor for the purpose of debate amendments were not in order.

Mr. CALKINS. But in the House an amendment is in order at any time during the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not; because that would take the control of the bill entirely away from the gentleman reporting it from the committee.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a parliamentary question.

Mr. CALKINS. The Chair will hear me.

Mr. BLAND. I want to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] has the floor on a point of order.

Mr. CALKINS. Will the Chair hear me for a moment on the point of order?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CALKINS. I think I am certainly right in regard to the practice of the House. When a bill is under consideration in Committee of the Whole no amendment is in order until the general debate has been closed and the consideration of the bill has been begun under the five-minute rule. But when a bill is being considered in the House an amendment is always in order whenever a member can obtain the floor and send his amendment up to the Clerk's desk and have it read. That has been the universal practice. An amendment is always in order in the House provided it is in the right degree; that is, unless there are already pending an amendment and an amendment to the amendment, and a substitute and an amendment to the substitute. When a bill is being considered in the House any member who obtains the floor can offer an amendment, have it read from the Clerk's desk, and it is then considered an amendment pending to the bill

The SPEAKER. But in fact no amendment was so offered prior to the demand for the previous question. The Chair will cause the Journal to be read, if desired, and from it it will appear that no amendment has been offered. During the progress of the debate the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], and perhaps other gentlemen, stated that they would offer amendments to the bill at the proper time, but no amendment was actually offered in due form.

Mr. CALKINS. Then I am mistaken as to the fact.

Mr. REED. Is it not in the power of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOWD] to withdraw his demand for the previous question simply for the purpose of allowing an amendment to be offered and then renew the demand?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so stated.

Mr. DOWD. If I have the right to withdraw the demand for the previous question I will do so and allow the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to offer his amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has that right.

Mr. DOWD. I withdraw the demand for the previous question for that purpose.

Mr. BLAND. I now move to strike out the fourth section of the bill.

Mr. DOWD. And I now renew the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] moves to amend this bill by striking out the fourth section; and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOWD] demands the previous question on the bill and the amendment. The Clerk will read the fourth section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the trade-dollars so received at the coinage mints shall be regarded and treated as silver bullion, and, at their bullion value, shall be deducted from the amount of bullion required to be purchased and coined by the act of February 28, 1878.

Mr. MILLS. I offer the amendment which I send up to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the previous question is pending.

Mr. MILLS. It was withdrawn, as I understood.

The SPEAKER. It was withdrawn to allow the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to offer an amendment, which he did, and then it was renewed.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the House will vote down the demand for the previous question, so that other amendments may be offered.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon ordering the previous question upon the pending amendment and the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to strike out the fourth section of the bill, which has been read.

Mr. BLAND. We had better have the yeas and nays on that.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were 46 in the affirmative.

So (more than one-fifth voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 131, nays 119, not voting 72; as follows:

YEAS—131.

So the motion to strike out the fourth section was agreed to.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. FINDLAY said: My colleague, Mr. TALBOTT, has been suddenly called home, and could not obtain a pair. He desired me to say that if present he would vote against striking out the fourth section of this bill, and would vote for the bill with or without the fourth section.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, I have voted on this question, forgetting that I had agreed to pair with my colleague, Mr. ERMENTROUT, on striking out this fourth section. But I find that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CANDLER] is also paired with my colleague on this question, and therefore I leave my vote stand.

The written statement at the Clerk's desk says that I am paired with my colleague "until further notice," as though we were paired on all questions, which is not correct. My colleague and I are both in favor of the passage of this bill. I shall therefore vote also upon that question.

The following pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. WASHBURN, until the 8th instant.

Mr. MORSE with Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, until the 7th instant.

Mr. WEMPLE with Mr. JOHNSON, until the 3d instant.

Mr. SENEY with Mr. BISBEE, until the 8th instant.

Mr. MUTCHLER with Mr. ATKINSON, until the 3d instant.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, with Mr. BENNETT, until the 7th instant.

Mr. CANDLER with Mr. ERMENTROUT, on the silver bill, if the fourth section is retained.

Mr. BLACKBURN with Mr. MCKINLEY, on all political questions, for this day. Mr. MCKINLEY would vote "no" on the amendment of Mr. BLAND to the trade-dollar bill and "ay" upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire, with Mr. COOK, on the Bland amendment to the trade-dollar bill.

The following-named members were announced as paired until further notice:

Mr. YOUNG with Mr. BAYNE.

Mr. MCADOO with Mr. THOMAS.

Mr. MULLER with Mr. WADSWORTH.

Mr. DUNCAN with Mr. SMITH.

Mr. COBB with Mr. HOLTON.

Mr. FORAN with Mr. PETTIBONE.

Mr. SCALES with Mr. BURLEIGH.

Mr. DAVIDSON with Mr. STRUBLE.

The following-named gentlemen were announced as paired for this day:

Mr. ELLIS with Mr. KELLOGG.

Mr. GEDDES with Mr. OCHILTREE.

Mr. CONVERSE with Mr. MOREY.

Mr. STEVENS with Mr. MILLARD.

Mr. BURNES with Mr. CALKINS.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. BLAND moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. DOWD. I call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. KEIFER. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of this bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being—ayes 48, noes 126—more than one-fifth in the affirmative.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 198, nays 45, not voting 79; as follows:

YEAS—198.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. COOK was announced as paired with Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire.

Mr. DOWD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNDERVALUATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message of the President; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

In response to a resolution of the House of Representatives of January 15, 1884, requesting the President to forward to the House information, including reports from consuls and others, concerning the undervaluation, false classification, and other irregular practices in the importation of foreign merchandise, and to recommend what legislation, if any, is needed to prevent such frauds on the revenue, I have the honor to transmit herewith a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of the 28th ultimo, inclosing a draught of a bill on the subject, together with copies of reports taken from the files of the Treasury Department concerning the information desired.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 1, 1884.

PAYMENTS MADE BY SPAIN.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House the following message of the President; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State and accompanying papers, furnished in response to a resolution of the House of Representatives of January 16, 1884, calling for information as to the payments made by Spain in accordance with the terms of its treaty with the United States concluded February 17, 1884.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, April 1, 1884.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. BURLEIGH, until the 15th of April, on account of important business.

To Mr. MCKINLEY, for five days, from the 2d of April.

To Mr. MOREY, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. ERMENTROUT, for three days.

To Mr. JAMES, for four days.

To Mr. BENNETT, for five days, on account of important business.

COMMON-SCHOOL BILL.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent for the adoption of the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 4980) to aid temporarily in the support of common schools be fixed for consideration on Tuesday, the 15th of April, 1884, and the consideration thereof to be continued from day to day until finally disposed of, not to interfere with general appropriation or revenue bills or other prior orders.

Mr. TUCKER. I object.

And then, on motion of Mr. KING (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 2, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the credentials of Henry B. Payne, of Ohio, a Senator-elect from that State. The Chair will state that the Chair understands that these credentials are sent to the Senate in order to correct some informality that existed in the previous credentials that have been filed. The credentials will be read.

The credentials were read, and ordered to be placed on file, as follows:

I, George Hoadly, governor of the State of Ohio, do hereby certify that on the 15th day of January, 1884, being the second Tuesday after the organization of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, chosen at the State election held on the 9th day of October, 1883, Henry B. Payne was duly chosen and elected to the office of Senator in the Congress of the United States from the State of Ohio, in the form and manner following, to wit:

A majority of all the members elected to each house of said Legislature being present, each house separately did openly, by a viva voce vote of each member present, name one person for Senator in Congress from said State, and the name of the person, viz, the said Henry B. Payne, so voted for, who received a majority of the whole number of votes cast in each house, was entered on the journal of that house by the clerk thereof, and at 12 o'clock meridian of the following day, to wit, the 16th day of January, 1884, the members of the two houses, having convened in joint assembly, the journal of each house was duly read, and it appearing therefrom that the said Henry B. Payne had received a majority of all the votes cast in each house, he was then and there declared duly elected to the office of Senator to represent the State of Ohio in the Congress of the United States for the constitutional term of six years, beginning on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1885.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the State of Ohio to be affixed, at the city of Columbus, this 17th day of March, 1884.

[SEAL.] GEO. HOADLY.

By the governor.

JAS. W. NEWMAN, Secretary of State.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the 20th ultimo, copies of contracts with certain English manufacturers for and copies of requisitions authorizing the purchase from certain American manufacturers of armor-plates and other materials for the ironclad Miantonomoh; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GARLAND. I present the petition of Mrs. M. D. Garrett, of Van Buren, Ark., praying for relief on account of money paid to the sureties of her late husband, W. H. Garrett, late agent of the Creek Indians. I believe that the general rule has been to refer petitions of this character to the Committee on Finance, and I move the reference of the petition to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. I have a memorial signed by citizens of Connecticut, addressed to the Senators from that State but manifestly intended for the Senate, in opposition to the bills relating to the practice in patent suits. I ask that it be received, and move that it be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I present three letters, signed in each case by a number of junior officers of the Army, favoring the passage of Senate bill No. 1677, to increase the efficiency of the cavalry, artillery, and infantry. They are addressed to me personally but are substantially petitions intended for the Senate. I ask that they be received, and move their reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Kate Garnett Wells, president, in behalf of the Moral Education Association of Massachusetts, asking for the insertion of certain limitations in any bill that may be passed by Congress to amend the act entitled "An act to prevent the introduction of infectious and contagious diseases into the United States and to establish a national board of health;" which was referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

Mr. SEWELL presented a petition of citizens of New Jersey, praying for such amendments to the Chinese restriction act as are satisfactory to the Pacific coast delegations in Congress; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of citizens of New Jersey, praying that jetties be built at Corson's Inlet and Townsend's Inlet, on the coast of New Jersey, adjacent to Ludlam Island; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of shore-owners, citizens of New Jersey, remonstrating against the passage of the bill to bridge Staten Island Sound; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LAPHAM presented resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of Albany, N. Y., urging the enactment of a general bankrupt law at the present session; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the memorial of William B. Welles, of New York city, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. 1886) to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Torbert Post, No. 218, Grand Army of the Republic, of Arcade, N. Y., urging the passage of certain pension and bounty measures; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Arent B. Sorenson, praying compensation for his property taken for public use, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. 5261) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1300) to authorize the President to restore Tenedore Ten Eyck to his former rank in the Army, and to place him upon the retired-list of Army officers, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of Enoch Jacobs, praying compensation for services rendered the Department of State, reported a bill (S. 1983) to compensate Enoch Jacobs for services rendered to the Department of State; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 76) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan the governor of North Carolina certain tents and camp equipage for the use of the militia of the State, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred an amendment submitted by Mr. HOAR to the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GARLAND introduced a bill (S. 1979) for the relief of Gibson Morrison; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1980) to provide for a supervisory jurisdiction of the powers of district courts and judges exercising circuit-court powers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COKE introduced a bill (S. 1981) for the relief of D. W. Hatch; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on file in the case, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VOORHEES, introduced a bill (S. 1982) to refund to Dr. F. O. St. Clair $97.80, duties on a monument to the memory of Francis J. Townshend, late of the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 1984) for the relief of Susan E. Alger; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. MAXEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4976) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

KANAWHA RIVER BRIDGE.

On motion of Mr. MCMILLAN, it was Ordered, That one hundred copies of the letter of Lieut. Col. William P. Craighill, of the Engineer Corps, United States Army, concerning the construction of bridges across the Great Kanawha River, be printed for the use of the Committee on Commerce.

AWARDS UNDER SPANISH TREATY.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to institute negotiations with the government of the King of Spain for a reference to an umpire for decision of the question whether the treaty of 1819 has been fully carried into effect by the United States, and whether the Government of the United States is bound in good faith to pay the full amounts awarded by the judicial tribunals, to whom the same was referred, for the payment of the losses sustained from the forces acting under the orders of the United States in 1818-'19, including interest and damages thereon; also, all other questions arising under said treaty in which it is claimed by the Government of Spain that the United States of America have failed to perform and carry out the same; and to settle and finally decide what amounts, if any, remain to be paid by the United States.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4976) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 210) requiring the Secretary of War to furnish copies of certain muster-rolls to the governor of the State of Ohio.

FLORIDA INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions" that order is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under the eighth rule, commencing with Order of Business 165, being the bill (S. 230) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to settle the claim of the State of Florida on account of expenditures made in suppressing Indian hostilities, which was laid over yesterday on account of the absence of the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES]. If there be no objection it will be again passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar. The Chair hears no objection. The consideration of the next bill on the Calendar will be resumed.

WILLIAM H. CROOK.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 458) for the relief of William H. Crook.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has already been read as in Committee of the Whole, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Claims. The amendment to the amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 6, it is proposed to strike out the words "four thousand" and to insert "two thousand four hundred."

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. All the evidence in support of this claim was submitted to the Committee on Claims and carefully considered by that committee. After considering such evidence the committee was of the opinion that a thousand dollars a year was no more than a fair compensation to pay this claimant for the work that he performed in the matter of signing land patents. The judgment of the whole Senate, however, is probably better than the judgment of any nine members of the body, and if the Senate is of the opinion that $600 a year instead of $1,000 a year is a sufficient compensation, the Committee on Claims will not object to that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the committee, which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 6, before the word "thousand," the committee propose to strike out "six" and insert "four;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to William H. Crook, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,000, as compensation for services as secretary to the President to sign land patents, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF WILLIAM TINDER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 953) for the relief of H. B. Wilson, administrator of the estate of William Tinder, deceased. It proposes to refund and pay to H. B. Wilson, administrator of the estate of William Tinder, deceased, $5,000, in full satisfaction of the claim of the estate of Tinder for money paid by that estate upon a judgment of forfeiture upon a bond for the appearance of one Evans, who was charged with crime by indictment in the circuit court of the United States for the district of West Tennessee, and who was afterward captured by the administrator and returned to the custody of the court, and convicted and punished for the crime with which he was charged.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. CONGER. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is.

Mr. CONGER. Or will the chairman of the committee state the substance of it?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The report is very brief, and probably the facts will appear as succinctly from that as from any statement that I can make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan ask for the reading of the report?

Mr. CONGER. Or a statement of the facts.

Mr. HARRIS. I think I can make a statement of the facts in the case in two minutes that will be satisfactory to the Senator.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It will not take two minutes to read the report.

Mr. HARRIS. Very well; let the report be read, then.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, February 11, 1884:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 953) for the relief of H. B. Wilson, administrator of the estate of William Tinder, deceased, have considered the same, and report thereon as follows:

That about the year 1878 one Evans was indicted in two cases for counterfeiting. The defendant was arrested, and Tinder, the intestate, stood bail for him in each case in the sum of $5,000. A trial was had in one case, and the jury disagreed. At the next term of the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Tennessee the accused, Evans, made default. Such proceedings were had in both cases that judgment final was rendered against Tinder for the amount of each bail bond. Tinder died, and his administrator, Wilson, paid all the costs in both cases and one of the judgments, the United States releasing the other. After this the administrator and some creditors of Tinder, whose estate was made insolvent by the payment above mentioned, instituted a search for Evans, and finally succeeded in procuring his arrest. Evans was convicted by his own plea on both indictments, and sentenced to the penitentiary on both, according to law, and is now serving out his sentence.

The administrator and creditors claim a return of the $5,000 paid as above. Judge Hammond, presiding in the court, recommends a return of the money. The committee believe that the money ought to be refunded. The object of the bail-bond was not to make money, but to secure the appearance of Evans and his punishment, if guilty. This has been accomplished by the efforts and the money of the bail, and all costs due the United States have been paid. We recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM G. FORD.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 873) for the relief of William G. Ford, of Memphis, Tenn. It refers to the Court of Claims the claim of William G. Ford, of Memphis, Tenn., for the proceeds of fifty bales of cotton, containing 25,568 pounds, seized under the captured-and-abandoned-property act at Mobile, Ala., in May, 1865, by acting Quartermaster Samuel Lappin, and shipped by him on the bark Ada Carter to the chief quartermaster at New York, and which was sold, and the proceeds paid into the Treasury.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the report be read so as to show what the bill is.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, February 11, 1884:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 873) for the relief of William G. Ford, of Memphis, Tenn., have considered the same, and submit the following report:

The petitioner is a citizen of the United States and a resident of Memphis, Tenn. In the month of May, 1865, S. S. Webb & Co., of Mobile, were the owners of fifty bales of cotton, stored in warehouses in Mobile, Ala., weighing altogether 25,568 pounds.

This cotton was seized by the authorities of the United States Government at the surrender of Mobile, April 12, 1865, and by Capt. Samuel Lappin, assistant quartermaster, United States Army, at Mobile, on the 19th day of May, 1865, delivered on board the bark Ada Carter, consigned to Brig. Gen. Stewart Van Vliet, chief quartermaster, United States Army, at New York, and by him turned over to Simeon Draper, United States cotton agent, Treasury Department, and sold, and the proceeds paid into the Treasury of the United States.

On the 7th of July, 1865, the said cotton, or the proceeds, were sold by Webb & Co. to the petitioner, who, in 1866, he alleges, filed his claim and proofs with the Secretary of the Treasury for settlement.

Here, it is alleged, the case was delayed and a hearing postponed from time to time, until the petitioner was notified by the Secretary of the Treasury that that Department had been entertaining jurisdiction of such claims under a mistake as to their authority, and that all such cases must be referred to the Court of Claims.

It does not appear when this notice was given to the petitioner, but he alleges that he at once took steps to have proceedings instituted in the Court of Claims, when he was informed that his papers, proofs, and exhibits had been mislaid in the Treasury Department, or lost, which occasioned delay until September, 1868, when they were found. He was then advised by his counsel that by the provisions of the statute of limitations in such cases, passed March 12, 1863, (volume 12, page 820), he was barred from that court; that the statute began to run in August, 1866, and expired in August, 1868, about one month before he procured his papers from the Treasury Department.

The statute referred to provides as follows:

"SEC. 3. * * * And any person claiming to have been the owner of any such abandoned or captured property may at any time within two years after the suppression of the rebellion prefer his claim to the proceeds thereof in the Court of Claims."

The act of May, 1872 (vol. 17, p. 134), authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to settle for cotton seized, does not apply to this case, for the reason that it covers only cases of seizure which occurred after June 30, 1865. This cotton was shipped to New York in May, 1865, having been seized April 12, 1865.

The proceeds of this cotton was paid into the United States Treasury under the abandoned-and-captured-property act, and is there held in trust in that fund for whoever may in the Court of Claims establish their right to it according to law. (See reply of Secretary of the Treasury McCulloch to the Court of Claims, and printed evidence in Dominick O'Grady vs. The United States, 1870; also United States vs. Kline, 13 Wall., 128.)

But in response to an inquiry made of the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to this claim he says, under date of January 18, 1878: * * * "The records of this Department do not show the filing at any time of the claim of William G. Ford for fifty bales of cotton seized in May, 1865, at Mobile, Ala."

The original petition states that the "petition, with vouchers and papers in the Treasury Department, thereafter to be attached, referred to as exhibits, was accordingly drawn and forwarded from New York to Washington, and petitioner supposed timely proceedings had been instituted until some time afterward, to wit, in September, A. D. 1868, the papers were ascertained to have been mislaid in the Treasury Department, and the statute of limitations had interposed."

There is a supplemental or amended petition, which goes more into detail as to the losing of papers in the Treasury Department, which is sworn to by the petitioner.

The testimony herein alluded to is all that bears on the question of diligence on the part of the claimant or negligence on the part of the Treasury Department in mislaying papers.

The petitioner asks Congress to pass a bill authorizing him to prosecute his suit in the Court of Claims, notwithstanding the statute of limitations; and your committee, being satisfied that the petitioner ought to "have his day in court," report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

Mr. CONGER. The report itself shows that this property was captured with the capture of Mobile; that it was properly taken in the conflict, in the capture and seizure of that city. I do not know by what rule of law or construction of evidence property taken in that way comes under the class for which settlement was to be made by the United States.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. This property was captured after the capture of Mobile.

Mr. CONGER. Of course; the army could not take it until it got in there, I admit.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I understand that. This property was in Mobile at the time of the capture of Mobile, belonging to the individual named in the report, and after the capture of the city the cotton was seized.

Mr. CONGER. At the surrender.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. After the surrender, of course.

Mr. CONGER. At the surrender, the report says.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It is not strictly accurate if it says that.

Mr. CONGER. And the person making this claim was not the owner, he does not claim to have been the owner of such abandoned or captured property. It seems to me that by the terms of the report this is as plain a case of property abandoned in the capture of the city at the surrender, as plain a case of property captured in the conflict or struggle as any case that could be stated. I have a great suspicion of these captured-and-abandoned cotton claims. I think there are lying around loose several million of dollars' worth of claims of that kind, and I think this one is lying around about as loose as any claim I ever saw reported upon.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think not.

Mr. CONGER. I do not think the committee concentrated its energies on this case with any great effort. I submit if this had been an application for the payment of this money or a restoration of the property by act of Congress it never could have had this report, but throwing the responsibility on the Court of Claims it gets by the watchfulness and care of the committee; and you have a very nice precedent for any assignee, any of the lawyers who have bought up this great amount of claims and have filed them away in their pigeon-holes, to come in as assignees and go to the Court of Claims, removing the limitation. There was a propriety in the law which said that after a certain date they might claim, because that date was after the war had closed, after the proclamation of peace. Property taken then was not taken as the property of an enemy. There is not a word said about the owner of this property having been loyal or disloyal.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Under the law it does not make a particle of difference.

Mr. CONGER. Not if it was taken after the war closed; but this was taken in April, 1865. The property the benefits of which this bill remits the assignee of the property was taken in April, and by the report itself the statute did not begin to run until August, 1865, after the proclamation of peace. After that there was reason why property should not be taken. It was not being used by the enemy; the war was closed; peace was restored. The property that was wandering about could not then be used by the opponents of the Government. The property to which the act did not apply was to be captured as if it was the property of the Confederate States. That to which the act did apply therefore might be returned. But this property was taken while the war was going on. I think the committee need a little suggestion now and then about this class of cases. I do not think the chairman made this report.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Yes; the chairman made it.

Mr. CONGER. I think somebody else must have prepared it.

Mr. ALLISON. Suppose we pass the bill over for the present.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Let us hear what the chairman says.

Mr. CONGER. Yes; I was merely making these remarks to call out the views of the chairman.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator from Michigan appears to be of opinion that the committee did not concentrate all its energies upon this claim before the report was made. This claim was considered by the Committee on Claims during the last Congress, when my friend from Michigan was a member of that committee. It was favorably reported from the Committee on Claims during the last Congress, and that report had the assent of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I guess not.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. There is no use guessing about it; the record will show that it did have. At that time all the members of the committee except the Senator from Michigan concentrated their energies upon the report, and they were aided by the Senator from Michigan.

This claim does not stand in a different position from any other of the cotton claims. After the capture of Mobile this cotton was seized under the captured-and-abandoned-property act. It was shipped by the Government to Simeon Draper, the cotton agent of the Government at the city of New York, and sold by him, and the proceeds were deposited in the Treasury, where they remain to this day, as a trust fund for the benefit of any person or persons who should be able to show in the Court of Claims that they were entitled to the fund. The Senator, if I understood him, appeared to be of the opinion that the captured-and-abandoned-property act only applied to cotton captured after what he calls the proclamation of peace.

Mr. CONGER. After June 30, 1865.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The proclamation of peace was made and applied to all except Texas on the same day, in August, 1866, so that peace legally did not exist in Mobile until August, 1866. The captured-and-abandoned-property act was passed in 1863, and it provided by its terms that that statute would not commence to run until the close of the war, that is, until the legal termination of the war, and that it would continue in force for two years from that time. This claimant, like many other claimants, supposed that the Treasury Department had jurisdiction of this and similar claims. The Treasury Department was of the opinion at that time that it did have jurisdiction of these claims; it entertained and considered the claims. The claimant, in pursuance of that understanding, filed his claim in the Department, and his papers and proofs were lost while in the Treasury Department. After a while it was concluded that the Treasury Department did not have jurisdiction, and he was informed that he must prosecute his case in the Court of Claims. When that conclusion was reached the papers could not be found, and were not found until about a month after the period within which he might have instituted a suit in the Court of Claims had expired. Now, all that the bill does is to remove the bar of the statute of limitations.

Mr. ALLISON. What is the special ground, the loss of the papers?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The loss of the papers. The claimant was prevented from bringing the action within the two years in consequence of the loss of his proofs, and those proofs were lost by the carelessness and negligence of the Treasury Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. GARLAND. I believe that the showing for the removal of the bar of the statute is a good one in this case, but there is one thing to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate in the second section of this bill. It makes the testimony already taken by Ford competent in this case. I would suggest a qualification of that "so far as the testimony is now competent," and not to make it absolutely competent, as proposed by this section.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. GARLAND. I think it would be better to strike out the second section entirely.

The Chief Clerk read the section proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the evidence heretofore taken in the case and filed in the Treasury Department, and the evidence and papers on file before Congress, shall be admitted and heard by the court the same as if taken over again under the rules and orders of the court; and either party may take additional testimony, and shall have the right of appeal as in other cases.

Mr. CONGER. Let that clause be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to strike out the section.

Mr. CONGER. But I want the whole clause read before the vote is taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section will be read.

The Chief Clerk again read the second section.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think the section may as well go out.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] to strike out the section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN P. WALWORTH.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1037) for the relief of John P. Walworth. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John P. Walworth $2,820, being the proceeds of the sale of certain funds, to wit, $4,700 in bank notes of the issue of the Louisiana Bank of New Orleans, and which were, in the month of August, 1863, on deposit in that bank to the credit of John P. Walworth, and received from the bank by Col. S. B. Holabird, chief quartermaster at the post of New Orleans, La., by order of Major-General Banks, and sold, and the proceeds thereof, to wit, $2,820, afterward covered into the Treasury of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SECURITY ON APPEALS AND WRITS OF ERROR.

The bill (S. 835) to amend section 1000 of the Revised Statutes, in relation to giving security in cases on appeal or writ of error, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the damages in section 1000 mentioned for which a bond shall be taken, when it is to operate as a supersedeas, shall be held to cover the value of the use, rents, and profits of any personal property or real estate the possession of which is continued in the plaintiff in error or appellant by such writ of error or appeal during the time that the supersedeas may be in operation.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

The bill (S. 554) to promote the efficiency of the General Land Office was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment, was in section 3, line 6, after the word "thousand," to strike out "two hundred and fifty;" so as to read:

The additional law clerk and examiners of office decisions shall receive a salary of $2,000 a year each.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of this bill if this increase of force in the Land Office is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior as absolutely necessary to the efficiency of that office?

Mr. MORGAN. I am not in charge of the bill. I suppose the chairman of the committee is in charge of the bill properly.

Mr. DOLPH. I understand it is so recommended. There is a report accompanying the bill made by me.

Mr. PLUMB. It is proper that the report should be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the committee will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. DOLPH February 11, 1884:

The Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 554) to promote the efficiency of the General Land Office, makes the following report:

Having duly considered the bill, the committee recommends that, for the reasons stated in the letter from the honorable Commissioner of the General Land Office to the honorable Secretary of the Interior, dated January 21, 1884, and the letter from the honorable Secretary of the Interior to the chairman of this committee of date January 28, 1884, which are hereto appended, marked A and B, the bill do pass as amended.

B.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, January 28, 1884.

SIR: In response to request of your committee, dated 7th instant, for an expression of the views of the Department on Senate bill No. 554, "to promote the efficiency of the General Land Office," I transmit herewith a copy of a letter on the subject addressed to me on the 21st instant by the Commissioner of the Land Office, with whom I fully concur that the bill should pass.

Very respectfully, &c.,

H. M. TELLER, Secretary.

Hon. P. B. PLUMB,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands, United States Senate.

A.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 21, 1884.

SIR: I am in receipt, by your reference of the 15th instant, of a letter from Hon. P. B. PLUMB, chairman Senate Committee on Public Lands, transmitting, for an expression of your views thereon, a copy of Senate bill No. 554, "to promote the efficiency of the General Land Office."

I have the honor to report that said bill is in accordance with my views in respect to the present and pressing needs of this office.

The first section increases the salary of the Commissioner to $5,000 a year. I have recommended this increase as due to the office of Commissioner, irrespective of the person who may hold the position. I deem such increase due to the character, importance, labor, and responsibility of the office, which certainly should not be rated second in dignity to other bureaus of the Executive Departments not so closely connected with vast material interests of the people. Neither do I think it expedient as a matter of public policy that strikingly inadequate salaries should be paid to officers invested with such powers as are committed to this office. The latter remark is applicable to the several positions for which a moderate increase in compensation is provided by Senate bill No. 554.

The second section provides for the appointment of an assistant commissioner. There is great need of such office in this bureau. A similar provision is made for other bureaus not having more, if as much, necessity for it as the General Land Office.

The Patent Office has an assistant commissioner at $3,000. The Pension Office has two deputy commissioners, at a salary of $3,600 each. The Auditors of the Treasury, six in number, have each a deputy auditor; there is an assistant treasurer for the office of United States Treasurer; the First and Second Comptrollers of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency have each a deputy; there is an assistant Register of the Treasury, and a deputy commissioner of internal revenue. Upon none of the heads of these bureaus are duties imposed more arduous, exacting, or comprehensive than those which pertain to this office.

The third section provides for an additional law clerk and two examiners of office decisions, at salaries of $2,250 each, and ten chiefs of divisions, at $2,000 a year each, and increases the salaries of the law clerk and chief clerk to $2,500 a year each.

The duties and responsibilities of the chief clerk of this office are greater than those usually devolving upon similar officers. He is not only required to exercise supervision over official details and discipline, but he shares the higher responsibilities of important adjudications, and in the absence of the Commissioner performs the duties of the head of the bureau.

The present salary of the law clerk is disproportionate to the position. The salary proposed by the Senate bill is the least the Government should fix for that office.

A clerk of the fourth class is now detailed as additional law clerk, with duties and responsibilities similar to those of the law clerk. The compensation of a fourth-class clerk is not adequate to such service. The increase proposed by the Senate bill for the law branch of this office is no less moderate than just and expedient.

Two clerks of the fourth class are now detailed as examiners of office decisions. Their duties are to read all letters and to examine decisions prepared in the several divisions of the office before the same are presented to the Commissioner for his signature. It being physically impossible for the Commissioner to read all the papers he signs, he is compelled to rely largely upon the judgment passed by the examiners in cases not specially submitted to him.

The responsibility and importance of the work performed by the examiners and the experience, skill, and fidelity required in that service fully command the salary proposed by the Senate bill.

In all other bureaus of the Executive Departments chiefs of divisions are paid from $2,000 to $2,500 a year. In the Patent Office the salary is $2,000, exclusive of examiners, who receive from $2,400 to $3,000; in the Pension Office, $2,000; in the Indian Office, $2,000; in the Office of the First Auditor of the Treasury Department, $2,000; of the Second Auditor, $2,000; of the Third Auditor, $2,000; of the Fourth Auditor, $2,000; of the Fifth Auditor, $2,000; of the Sixth Auditor, $2,000; in the United States Treasurer's Office, $2,500; in the office of the First Comptroller, $2,100; of the Second Comptroller, $2,100; in the office of Comptroller of the Currency, $2,200; in the Register's Office, $2,000; in the Internal Revenue Bureau, $2,250; in the bureaus of the Post-Office Department, $2,000 and upwards. In no other office or Department are chiefs of divisions required to perform more important duties than in the General Land Office, but in this office the organization established at an early period still remains. Chiefs of divisions (except of public lands, private land claims, and surveys) are detailed from clerks of the fourth class, and none receive more pay than other fourth-class clerks, while in other offices chiefs of divisions are appointed as such and receive a higher rate of compensation than the classified clerks. I inclose herewith a partial list of officers provided for in several bureaus and Departments, showing the discrimination against this office, which appears to me unreasonable and unjust.

The proposition in the third section of the Senate bill to repeal the provision of law providing for the appointment of a principal clerk of public lands, a principal clerk of private land claims, and a principal clerk of surveys is designed to operate in connection with the proposition to authorize the appointment of ten chiefs of divisions, which would include the three principal clerks now specially provided for.

The last section of the bill (which should be numbered section 4 instead of section 5) appropriates moneys received for making copies of records to payment for doing the work. This provision would relieve the office of the necessity of taking clerks belonging to the general clerical force away from their proper duties to make out copies of papers for the use of private parties. The provision would be of convenience and an advantage in the administration of this office.

I respectfully recommend favorable action on Senate bill No. 554.

Very respectfully,

N. C. McFARLAND, Commissioner.

Hon. H. M. TELLER, Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BECK. I have not quite comprehended the full scope of the bill; I did not hear it distinctly. The Land Office has certainly been very fairly provided for so far as the Committee on Appropriations has had authority to do so. Perhaps the laws for it were reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Kentucky will allow me to say that the Committee on Appropriations have been very kind to the Land Office, but the difficulty has been that for the want of legislation whenever questions were made of the character presented in this bill they were ruled out on points of order. I have been trying for four years to get proper compensation for the clerks in this bureau, and the Committee on Appropriations have been acting with me as far as they could, but we have always failed in consequence of points of order.

Mr. BECK. Is the bill an increase of force or an increase of pay?

Mr. MORGAN. An increase of pay and one additional man.

Mr. PLUMB. It is necessary to have an increase of force.

Mr. BECK. I stepped into the room of the Committee on Appropriations just now while this report was being read, knowing that we had authorized a very large increase in that bureau; and I find that in 1879 there were 169 persons employed there and that we have increased the force to 331 in 1883, being an increase of 162 in that single bureau in the last four years.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Kentucky will allow me to say that while that is true, every man in that office is employed diligently at work not only during the regular office hours but during a large portion of the other time, for which he gets no compensation; and there are now not less than 150,000 undecided cases in the Land Office, and that office will remain behind and the people will be deprived of their land titles unless we come to their relief. This matter has been recommended for the last ten years by every Commissioner who has been in that office and every Secretary of the Interior, urgently demanding of Congress some increase in the force. This bill increases the force only by one assistant commissioner, but it gives some additional compensation.

Mr. ALLISON. A law clerk, I observed from the reading.

Mr. MORGAN. He is there now.

Mr. ALLISON. There is one law clerk now, but I understand the bill to provide for an additional law clerk.

Mr. MORGAN. No, that is only a change of name. There is but one increase of force in it, and that is the provision for an assistant commissioner. It is physically impossible for the Commissioner of the General Land Office to perform the labor that is devolved upon him in that office. He can not properly oversee the business of the office from the mere engagement he has in signing his name to papers other people have to prepare for him, which he has no leisure and no opportunity to read. There is not a Department of this Government that is so much neglected by Congress as the General Land Office, and there is none in which the people are so much interested to-day as they are in that Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment of the Committee on Public Lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands was, in section 3, line 8, after the word "thousand," to insert "two hundred and fifty;" so as to read:

And chiefs of divisions shall receive a salary of $2,250 a year each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, after the word "each," line 9, to strike out:

And all provisions of law for the appointment of principal clerks of public lands, private land claims, and surveys are hereby repealed.

And insert in lieu thereof:

And the ten chiefs of divisions shall hereafter be appointed by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate.

Mr. HAWLEY. Am I to understand that there are to be ten additional officers or only one?

Mr. PLUMB. The number is the same as now, only they are called now principal clerks, and they are called by this bill chiefs of division, which they are in fact, and have been ever since the department was established. It adds nothing to the number.

Mr. HAWLEY. My question about the amendment bears upon the appointment of these officers by the President. Why should not these chiefs be promoted from the very excellent clerks already there?

Mr. MORGAN If the Senator will allow me to explain it to him, as the law stands now, enacted a good many years ago, perhaps fifteen years ago, there are three principal clerks in the Land Office. They are the clerks of the public land division, of the private land claims division, and the clerk of surveys. Those were required by the statute to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate before they could enter on their office. The bill as introduced permitted the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner to appoint all these ten clerks. The committee thought we could get a better class of material and dignify the office by requiring that all these chiefs of division should be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, as the three were by the old law and as the three are now. Three of the twelve clerks are now appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and the other nine are merely appointed under the regulations of the department.

Mr. HAWLEY. Am I to understand, then, that there are no new officers created, but the name is changed and the power of appointment changed from the Secretary of the Interior to the President?

Mr. MORGAN. That is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. I believe the amendments reported by the committee are now disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are.

Mr. DOLPH. I am instructed by the committee to propose some further amendments recommended by the department. In line 3, section 3, after the word "division," I move to insert:

Public lands; private land claims; surveys; railroads; pre-emptions; swamp lands; accounts; minerals; special service; and drafting.

This amendment merely enumerates the divisions for which the ten chiefs are to be appointed. It is a mere clerical matter, but it is deemed necessary by the Department.

Mr. ALLISON. Let me ask the Senator from Oregon whether or not it is necessary to fix these chiefs by law? It seems to me that some time a Commissioner of the General Land Office will desire to make some modifications in the organization of his office, and he would find this law in his way. The Departments are organized usually by the head of the Department without signifying or designating in law the particular divisions.

Mr. DOLPH. I will state to the Senator from Iowa that the amendment was suggested by the Commissioner of the General Land Office himself and it was brought before the committee and the committee approved of it.

Mr. PLUMB. These divisions are inevitable and have been in actual existence for many years. They can not be dispensed with, and I think it is proper that the law should create them just as it has created divisions and bureaus in the other Departments of the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. I offer also the following amendment: In line 7, section 3, after the word "division," insert "and the recorder."

In explanation of this amendment I will state that it was supposed by the committee that the recorder was included in the increase of salary to $2,000 per annum. That appears not to be the case, and it is now proposed to amend by inserting the recorder, so as to increase his salary to $2,000 a year. The committee were unanimously of the opinion that the increase ought to be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. I also offer the following amendment, to be added to section 3 as a proviso:

Provided, That whenever the office of recorder shall become vacant, or in case of the sickness or absence of the recorder, the duties of his office shall be performed ad interim by a chief of division to be designated by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. Before the bill passes to the next stage I should like to ask some member of the committee whether this bill really will be of any material assistance to the Land Office in disposing of the vast mass of work that has accumulated there, beyond the fact that it attempts to secure some able chiefs of division? Is not more room needed? Has not the work been reported to be in most important cases left to the decision of men not qualified by age, skill, or learning? The bill is well enough as far as it goes, but it gives only one additional officer to the Land Office, elevates the rank of others, and increases their pay.

While I am not, from my location, interested as much in these matters as Western Senators, and am not so familiar with the business, yet I have known well some gentlemen in that office, and it has been a chronic complaint for years that it needed reorganization and enlargement, and that vast interests were neglected simply by the unwillingness or procrastination of Congress. Why not go more thoroughly into the business if we are going to reorganize at all?

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I can not better answer the inquiry of the Senator from Connecticut than by asking to have a portion of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office relating to the increase of clerical force read. This bill as introduced did not cover that matter, and while it is undoubtedly a very important matter for legislation, the committee did not deem it advisable to attach it to this bill. I ask for the reading of the part of the report which I have marked in the document sent to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The extract will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The General Land Office has been deficient in clerical organization from the beginning. There has at no time been a sufficient number of employés to dispose of current work. The increase provided for from time to time has never been proportionate to the increase of business. The volume of work in arrears at the close of each fiscal year has steadily and rapidly grown larger. At the same time, the amount of work accomplished has been greater in proportion than the increase in clerical force. This has resulted from improved system and continued efforts to promote efficiency. But in late years the increase in the amount of work thrown upon the office has been almost overwhelming. The increase in working force and appropriations has been doled out in pittances, and seemingly more to accommodate the Department than to meet the demands of the service. It is no personal advantage to yourself or the Commissioner that work should be disposed of, but it is of public consequence that this official work should be performed.

It is a matter of deep complaint and is felt to be a public shame that men upon the frontier who are developing the country by their enterprise and labor should suffer delay and have their rights imperiled through a false or simulated economy in the necessary disbursements for the conduct of public business.

In 1876 the amount of land disposed of under the public land system was 6,000,000 acres. In 1883 the disposals were 19,000,000 acres, an increase of 200 per cent. The actual amount of new business brought into this office during the last year embraced 226,088 entries, covering 19,430,032.80 acres (exclusive of filings and of areas previously reported), with receipts exclusive of fees for certified copies amounting to $11,705,765.65, against 161,396 entries, 14,309,166.40 acres, and $8,387,927.29 the previous year, being an average increase over 1882 of 39 per cent. and an increase over the year 1881 of 82 per cent.

The increase in clerical force allowed by the last annual appropriation was only 10 per cent., one-half of which was absorbed in the entirely new work of protecting the public lands provided for by recent legislation.

A large volume of work is annually thrown upon the office for which no provision is made in the usual estimates for clerical force. This consists in the preparation of official reports and answers to Congressional and other inquiries. Much of the time of a large number of clerks is occupied during the sessions of Congress, and frequently at other periods, in this manner.

There are now pending before this office 600,000 claims of record in some stage of inception or progress under general laws, exclusive of railroad grants, swamp and mineral lands, and private land claims. The pending agricultural claims alone involve an adjudication of title to 90,000,000 acres. If but one-half of these claims should be perfected into title it would take the present force employed upon this work three years to complete the adjustments, leaving the whole volume of business that might come up within that period unprovided for.

I have asked for one hundred additional clerks for the service of the next fiscal year. This estimate was made before the completed returns and accounts had disclosed the extent of the increase in business during the year and without fully considering the inadequacy of such estimate. It is my most conservative opinion that two hundred additional clerks of the higher grades are immediately needed, and could be employed with economy to the Government for a number of years to come. Provision for a grade of examiners of land titles, corresponding to the grade of principal examiners in the Pension Office, would be extremely desirable.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator in charge of this bill to strike out the amendment in lines 11 and 12 of section 3, or rather that a separate vote be taken on that amendment. It provides for the appointment of these chiefs of divisions by the President of the United States with the consent of the Senate. I submit that that is a bad precedent. There are chiefs of divisions in every Department of the Government, and if we begin by appointing them in this manner all the other Departments of the Government will at once ask the same thing, and then there will be some other steps from time to time looking to advanced compensation and so on.

In addition to that, it is bad policy it seems to me. The Secretary of the Interior—the Commissioner of the General Land Office primarily, and the Secretary of the Interior in the second place—is responsible for the conduct of this office immediately, and should have the selection of these chiefs of divisions, it seems to me, without reference to a confirmation by the Senate, without reference to whatever usually follows an appointment by the President.

I submit that this is a very bad precedent to begin with here. I know the Senator from Alabama will say that three of these officers are already so appointed. That is true under the old organization, but they were not called chiefs of divisions; they had specific designations then. But even if these three officers were so appointed, it does not constitute a reason for the appointment of ten, and it was bad policy in the beginning to have the three so appointed.

Mr. MORGAN. I take issue with the Senator from Iowa in regard to the policy of this bill as proposed by the committee. All of these chiefs of divisions have to deal with the 500,000 cases that the Commissioner speaks of in his report that has just been read at the desk, a great number of them cases of interference of every kind, which contain judicial questions, many of them of a very difficult character. There are now principal clerks at the head of these different divisions before whom records come that involve millions of dollars; many of them involve more than a million dollars and more than a thousand pages of manuscript records for investigation. They are merely appointees or servants of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. They have no independent standing in the Government; they have no personal responsibility except to the one eye which appoints and oversees them. I would like to dignify these positions, and I would like the Senate to have a word to say in respect to who shall fill these judicial stations, for they are judicial stations of more consequence, taking them separately, than so many judges of the district court of the United States. They have great cases to try; they have cases of great importance to try; and not only should they be rewarded sufficiently to get a high range of ability, but the gentlemen who preside in these divisions ought to have the distinction of being appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Of course they will be selected practically by the Commissioner of the General Land Office or by the Secretary of the Interior; his recommendation will be quite sufficient to justify the President in the selection of men for these places; and in that respect the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior will have full control over them. They will be removed by the President if they are not efficient and are so reported by these officers or if they are guilty of dereliction of duty, and other men will be put in their places.

Allow me to say that while I have perfect confidence in the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and I can say that also in respect to those who have preceded him as far as I know, we are confiding to him a very enormous power, and it is a power which he does not necessarily exercise under his own personal supervision, but through a sort of confidence that springs up between an employer and an employé. One of these gentlemen at the head of one of these divisions takes a case and has it prepared for decision and makes his ruling upon it. The Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior have no opportunity, have not time to investigate the case, and they must rely on the judgment of these subordinate officers. Now, what is one of them really? Here is responsibility thrown upon the Commissioner, we will say, without his having really the power to control the subordinate officer, for he has not time to revise his decisions. The responsibility in the case ought to rest upon the subordinate who makes the decision. There is the place to get a valid judicial ascertainment of the rights of the parties. There is the place from which these decisions virtually come. They come in fact from the heads of the different divisions; and while the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of the General Land Office may be held responsible in a certain sense for these decisions, the truth is that the responsibility rests upon the subordinates. I would dignify these subordinate officers; I would throw the responsibility upon them; I would let them feel that they are officers of higher rank than they are now, and we should then get a better character of public service, I think, from them.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama if these places are not all filled now by thoroughly competent and worthy gentlemen?

Mr. MORGAN. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. ALLISON. Is it proposed to substitute others for the gentlemen who fill these places?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly not by me; for what influence have I over the appointing power in the United States Government? Not the slightest.

Mr. ALLISON. I trust a very great deal. I know that the Senator ought to have great influence over such matters. But it seems to me that if these officers who are now in position and have grown up there and have shown themselves competent for the discharge of these duties are not to be changed in this particular case, there is no necessity for substituting a new mode of appointment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Alabama has expired.

Mr. MORGAN. I was called to my feet by a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But the Senator from Iowa having spoken once can only occupy the floor in the time of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not desire to occupy the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. If he asks me a question my answer is in his time.

Mr. ALLISON. I only want a vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in all the amendments made in Committee of the Whole except the one reserved by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reserved amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 3 the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, added the following:

And the ten chiefs of divisions shall hereafter be appointed by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in this amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. VOORHEES. I would inquire of those who have charge of the bill and have given it more attention than I have whether it would be in order to offer an amendment increasing the clerical force of the Land Office in accordance with the wishes of the Commissioner of the General Land Office?

Mr. MORGAN. Of course it would be in order to offer an amendment of that kind, but it would lead to a protracted discussion, I dare say, and the Committee on Appropriations having always considered questions of the increase of clerical force, it is not one of those cases in which we must have a statute providing for so many clerks. The Committee on Appropriations have jurisdiction of that, and we did not want to invade their province, but allowed them to dispose of that matter as they thought best, all things considered.

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to say that whenever that is in order I shall vote for a liberal increase of the clerical force of the Land Office. In my intercourse with that office I have found it greatly crippled by the want of proper assistance, and I know of no bureau of this Government that is so useful to the people and so badly equipped to perform its proper duties.

I will not detain the Senate with remarks which I might indulge in if the matter was properly before the Senate; but I hope when the Committee on Appropriations have a proper bill in charge this matter will not be overlooked.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

Mr. MORRILL. I notice that Senators having in charge the next two bills [Mr. HALE and Mr. HARRISON] are absent. I presume that they both desire to be present when they are considered. I therefore ask that they be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to passing over without prejudice the next two bills, being the bill (S. 867) for the relief of the officers and crew of the United States steamer Monitor who participated in the action with the rebel iron-clad Merrimac on the 9th day of March, 1862, and the bill (S. 207) to amend section 1190 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to paymasters' clerks of the United States Army?

Mr. COCKRELL. Those bills can not be disposed of under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask to have them passed over.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to their being passed over and going on the other Calendar, so as not to remain on the five-minute Calendar.

Mr. MORRILL. Let them remain where they are for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the two bills referred to be passed over informally without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. PLUMB. Will the effect of that be other or different than the effect of an objection to them?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Entirely so. If the request of the Senator from Vermont is agreed to by the Senate, these bills hold their place at the head of the Calendar under Rule VIII. If objected to, they pass to the Calendar under Rule IX.

Mr. PLUMB. I shall be obliged to object to their remaining on the present Calendar.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator can make the same objection when the Senators having them in charge are present, and therefore it would be more courteous to wait until they are present.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Vermont? The Chair hears none; and the bills are passed over without prejudice.

Mr. MORRILL. The next three bills have been reported adversely. I ask that they be pased over for the purpose of taking up a bill that I think no one will object to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator object to the three bills referred to?

Mr. MORRILL. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Being objected to, the three bills are passed over, being Senate bills 971, 972, and 809. The next bill is Order of Business 215, being Senate bill 1459.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE COINAGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1459) relating to the improvement of the coinage.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say that this bill as amended has received the unanimous approval of every member of the Committee on Finance. I ask that it be read as amended, as a large part of the bill was stricken out by the committee, and it only relates to the improvement of the coinage and nothing else.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Vermont that there are various amendments scattered through the body of the bill, and therefore it is better to read the bill as it was introduced and then the amendments.

Mr. MORRILL. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

Mr. MORRILL. I supposed we could get along with less reading by taking the amendments as the text of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Why read from section 3 forward when all those sections are struck out?

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that the amendments be taken as the text of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection that course will be taken, and the Chief Clerk will report the bill as amended.

The Chief Clerk read the bill as proposed to be amended by the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to ask whether the bill gives any discretion about the kind of coinage and the title of coins or anything of that kind?

Mr. MORRILL. None whatever. It provides for nothing except as to the character of the designs and improvement of the designs.

Mr. MILLER, of California. It speaks of the relative value of the minor coins.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to hear that read.

Mr. MILLER, of California. This commission is to decide in respect to the relative value of the minor coins.

Mr. MORRILL. No; it does not decide on anything. It only makes report to Congress.

Mr. CONGER. Does it give any authority to give new names to coins or new values?

Mr. MORRILL. Nothing of that kind. It only provides for a report to Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment will be read.

The amendments of the committee were read, which were, in section 1, line 4, after the word "five," to strike out "artists or;" in line 9, after the word "value," to insert "of the minor coins;" in line 13, after the word "thousand," to strike out "five hundred;" in the same line, after the word "any," to strike out "artist or;" in line 15, after the word "paid," to strike out "the" and to insert "a;" in the same line, after the word "sum," to strike out the word "of" and to insert "not exceeding;" and in line 17, after the word "adopted," to insert "to be determined by the Director of the Mint;" so as to make the section read:

That the Director of the Mint is hereby authorized and directed to employ, temporarily, five persons distinguished in departments of art or in knowledge of coinage and medals, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall investigate and examine the whole subject of our existing system of coinage, with a view to its improvement and greater perfection of execution as to metals, relative value of the minor coins, and also as to devices, legends, and inscriptions; and the artists or persons so employed shall each be paid out of the contingent fund provided for the support of the Mint the sum of $2,000; and any person whose designs for any coin shall be accepted and adopted as hereinafter provided for shall be paid a sum not exceeding $750 for each design so accepted and adopted, to be determined by the Director of the Mint.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 5, after the word "submitted," to strike out the words "by the artists or other persons as;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 2. That on or before the 1st day of December, 1884, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of State, and the Director of the Mint shall examine the work and designs, together with any explanations submitted mentioned in the preceding section, and shall transmit the same, accompanied by a report, to Congress, with such recommendations as they shall judge most expedient.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment will be read.

Mr. MORRILL. All the rest of the bill is stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. There are other amendments of a more important character. Sections 3, 4, and 5 are stricken out entirely and should be mentioned separately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question then will be put on agreeing to the amendment striking out those sections.

Mr. BAYARD. I was following the Clerk in his reading, and I was not aware that the Senate had agreed to the amendment striking out the third, fourth, and fifth sections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The sections which the committee propose to strike out will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the third, fourth, and fifth sections, as follows:

SEC. 3. That when the report provided for in this act shall have been adopted by Congress the following provisions and regulations shall be observed and carried into effect:

First. All new coins shall be based on the metric system.

Second. All new fractional silver coins shall contain an amount of silver equal, in proportion to the nominal values respectively represented, to the standard silver dollar.

Third. In lieu of the 5-cent and 3-cent nickel coins a new 6-cent silver coin shall be coined.

Fourth. In lieu of any coins made chiefly or in part of copper a new 1-cent coin of pure nickel shall be coined.

SEC. 4. That whenever the new coinage of silver shall be authorized under the provisions of this act the fractional silver in the Treasury shall be used for the new silver coinage, and the amount so used shall be in lieu of an equal amount of silver required to be purchased monthly under existing laws for the coinage of the standard silver dollar; and any new silver coins shall be exchangeable at par at the mints, at the discretion of the superintendent, for any other silver coins heretofore authorized by law.

SEC. 5. That at the expiration of each fiscal year the Director of the Mint shall cause an examination to be made of all the medals executed at the Mint in Philadelphia; and the sum of $1,000 shall be paid, out of the contingent fund for the support of the Mint, to the engraver whose workmanship shall appear to have distinguished merit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Finance to strike out these sections.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. CONGER. I want to be very positive that this does not leave in the bill any authority to change the character or value or mode of our coinage. I do not see any place where it can be, unless it is that clause which authorizes the Director of the Mint to do certain things.

Mr. MORRILL. This is only intended to give the opportunity to the department to make some improvement in the character of our coinage. It is at the present time almost, I might say, disgraceful. We have hardly paid any attention to the style or skill or scientific beauty of our coinage from the foundation of the Government. While other governments are at large expense and sending out commissions to travel over the whole world to examine the different mints and the processes and the designs, we have done nothing of that sort. I assure the Senator from Michigan that there is nothing more in the bill, and whatever the commission do is to be reported to Congress for its action after it has been done.

Mr. CONGER. I know; but this bill started with a proposition to take the French system, the metric system, and I was a little afraid there might be something left that would lean a little that way in the bill, and, if so, I wanted to have it go over for further examination.

Mr. MORRILL. That is all out.

Mr. CONGER. I take the statement of the Senator from Vermont on that subject.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE W. KINGSBURY.

The bill (S. 1140) for the relief of Lieut. George W. Kingsbury was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Being objected to, the bill goes over.

CHARLES C. HILL.

The bill (S. 875) for the relief of Charles C. Hill, of Urbana, Ohio, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. SEWELL. The bill was reported adversely, and placed on the Calendar at the request of the Senator from Ohio who is absent from the Chamber [Mr. SHERMAN]. I ask that it go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

CAMP DOUGLAS RESERVATION.

The bill (S. 478) to authorize the Secretary of War to relinquish and turn over to the Interior Department certain parts of the Camp Douglas military reservation, in the Territory of Utah, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WILSON. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Being objected to, the bill goes over.

O. L. COCHRAN.

The bill (S. 1481) for the relief of O. L. Cochran, late postmaster at Houston, Tex., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $422.85, collected from him by the Post-Office Department on the 26th of November, 1867, and which amount is in excess of what he was indebted to the Department.

Mr. CONGER. I object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Being objected to, the bill goes over.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Michigan let the report, which is very short, be read, and I think he will find his objection answered by the report. If the report is read I think he will be perfectly satisfied.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan withdraw the objection?

Mr. CONGER. I am willing to let the bill go over without prejudice and hold its place.

Mr. MAXEY. Let the report be read; I think it will be conclusive.

Mr. CONGER. Very well; let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection is withdrawn; the report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. MAXEY February 13, 1884:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to which was referred the bill (S. 1481) for the relief of O. L. Cochran, late postmaster at Houston, Tex., respectfully submits the following report:

A bill identical with that before the Senate has been reported to the House, to wit, H. R. 1566. The report of the House embodies the report on the case of the Auditor for the Treasury Department, which is conclusive of the case. Said report of the House hereby adopted is as follows:

"This claim is based upon the following facts: O. L. Cochran was postmaster at Houston, Tex., in the year 1861. His account with the Government was settled in 1867, when he was found indebted to the United States in the sum of $568.71, which he paid under protest that he was not indebted.

"In this settlement he did not receive any compensation for his services as postmaster at Houston for the months of April and May, 1861, for the reason that if his returns had been rendered they were never received by the Auditor's Office or by the Post-Office Department for the months named.

"Subsequent to this payment, under protest, Cochran submitted a duplicate return as postmaster for the months of April and May, 1861, which would have reduced his indebtedness in the settlement made in 1867 from $568.71 to $145.86, showing an overpayment made by him of $422.85, which is now justly due him.

"All this is certified by the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department.

"Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill."

OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR OF THE TREASURY
FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 30, 1884.

SIR: In answer to your inquiry for the facts in the case of Owen L. Cochran, who was a postmaster at Houston, Tex., I have the honor to submit the following statement:

A settlement was made in this office of Mr. Cochran's account in the year 1867, when he was found indebted to the United States in the sum of $568.71, which he paid under protest that he was not indebted.

In the above settlement Mr. Cochran did not receive any compensation for his services as postmaster at Houston for the months of April and May, 1861, for the reason that if the returns had been rendered they were never received by the Auditor's Office or by the Post-Office Department for the months named.

Subsequent to this payment under protest Mr. Cochran submitted a duplicate return as postmaster for the months of April and May, 1861, which would have reduced his indebtedness in the settlement made in 1867 from $568.71 to $145.86, showing an overpayment made by him of $422.85, and the sum of $422.85 is justly due to Mr. Cochran.

Respectfully,

J. H. ELA, Auditor.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART, House of Representatives.

Wherefore the committee reports S. 1481 without amendment, and recommends that the same do pass.

Mr. CONGER. This is one of those cases where the postmaster in the year 1861, being in a State which at that time became in rebellion, under the orders of the postmaster-general of the confederacy, retained all the property and money in his hands and did not make report thereof to (and that was the reason why the report was not received by) the Postmaster-General of the United States. I should want more proof that this postmaster settled with the Government, carried on the business of his office, and did not pay over to the postmaster-general of the Confederate States the money and stamps and property in his hands at that time. That is the reason I desire that the case shall go over until I can find when the order of the confederate postmaster-general was made to pay over this money and the time from which this officer must have made his reports to the postmaster-general of the Confederate States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. MAXEY. I wish to make a single remark in reply to the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Senator from Texas will be indulged.

Mr. MAXEY. I wish to say that the Auditor for the Post-Office Department states, under date of January 30, 1884, that the sum of $422.85 is justly due to Mr. Cochran, and I presume he knew what he was saying.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the unfinished business by title.

OHIO MUSTER-ROLLS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I rise to a privileged question. Yesterday the Senate passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 210) requiring the Secretary of War to furnish copies of certain muster-rolls to the governor of the State of Ohio. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider, which is available under the rules, and I also accompany that with a motion for a request to the House of Representatives to return the joint resolution to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

Mr. COCKRELL. The latter motion that I make, to request the return of the bill to the Senate, is to be disposed of immediately under the rule. I hope it will be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senate agree to the motion of the Senator from Missouri that the Senate request the House to return the bill referred to?

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN G. ROSE.

Mr. MCPHERSON. On Friday, the 28th of March, the bill (S. 717) for the relief of John G. Rose was postponed indefinitely in my absence from the Senate. It had been reported adversely, but at my request it was placed on the Calendar. I ask unanimous consent for a reconsideration of the bill, with a view to again placing it on the Calendar.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be again placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. PLUMB to recommit the bill to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I feel very deeply and very profoundly the gravity and importance of the measure now before the Senate. I know of no measure likely to engage the attention of this Congress which has so much in it of weal and of benefit to the people whom I represent in part upon this floor, and also to the people of the United States.

We are met, those of us who advocate the bill, by two very serious objections, one urged by the Senator from Texas who sits before me [Mr. COKE], who denies our power to pass the bill, and the other urged by his colleague [Mr. MAXEY] as well as by himself, that the passage of it, if constitutional, would be fraught with the greatest dangers, the greatest evil, to the people whom I represent.

I have gravely considered this question. I have looked at it with reference to the power of Congress to pass the measure, and also with reference to its effect upon the people, not only of Mississippi, but of the United States. I am satisfied that whatever might have been the original and proper interpretation of the Constitution of the United States upon this subject, now there can be no valid objection to the exercise of the power which we assume. I feel also satisfied that the injuries and the dangers predicted by the two Senators from Texas will not result from the passage of this measure, but, on the other hand, the greatest benefits in the elevation and advancement not only of the colored people of the South who so much need it, but also of the unlettered portion of the white population of that section and throughout the Union.

The Senator who sits before me [Mr. COKE] has assailed the position in my argument which I first delivered to the Senate upon this subject, and with so much of personal application to myself, that I feel I am bound to restate it, as he misunderstood it, and to re-enforce the position which I then assumed.

In that argument I admitted that as an original question I would be inclined to adopt the view of Mr. Madison, which would confine the appropriating power of Congress to the specific objects enumerated in other and subsequent clauses of the Constitution than the first, but I stated that the practice of this Government from its earliest day to the present time had been in opposition to that view, and I felt bound to acquiesce in that settlement of the question. I stated that distinctly as my position; yet the Senator does not assail my position by denying that acquiescence in an acknowledged power of the Government for a long period of time by the people and the exercise of that power for a long period of time by the Congress was a sufficient reason for adopting the constitutional construction thus settled. In all his argument he did not allude to that. He assumed that at a hundred years very nearly from the adoption of the Constitution it lies within the breast and conscience of each Senator to put what construction he pleases upon that instrument, regardless of the practice of those who have preceded us in the administration of the Government.

I also stated that I had adopted the views of President Monroe upon this subject. The Senator denies that I have adopted those views. He insists that Mr. Monroe took an entirely different view of this question from the one maintained by me.

Now, let me state the question before I read the authorities to show that I am right upon this subject. My position is that the words to "provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," in the first clause of the granted powers of the Constitution, do not confer an independent and substantive power, but that they do confer or recognize a power of appropriation beyond and outside of the limits of the subsequently enumerated powers. Remember that I do not say they confer or recognize a power of appropriation beyond the enumerated powers of the Constitution, but only beyond those powers which are subsequently enumerated, because the power to lay and collect taxes and to appropriate money for the common defense and general welfare of the United States is an enumerated power in the Constitution.

My position is, as Mr. Monroe's was and as has been the practice of the Government, namely, that while discarding the idea that "to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States" conferred a substantive and independent and distinct power, which if true would have made all the subsequent enumerations of power in the Constitution utterly useless, yet that the power to appropriate money might be applied to objects outside of the subsequently enumerated powers, provided only they were for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

Let me state the position again, because I do not wish to be misunderstood. I deny that the words "to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States" give a substantive, distinct, and independent power to the Congress of the United States; but I do say that they are a qualification and limitation upon the otherwise unrestricted power of appropriation and taxation conferred by the taxing clause of the Constitution, so as to authorize the appropriation of money to any purpose of a national and general character, not merely local and private, which the Congress might deem essential to the general welfare and common defense of the people of the United States, and that it conferred or recognized no further power.

Let us see if I have misunderstood Mr. Monroe upon this subject. Let us see whether I have not other authorities as high if not higher than Mr. Monroe himself to sustain me. I quote first the language of him who is regarded as the father of State rights in American politics, no less a person than Mr. Jefferson himself. In an official opinion, when he was a member of General Washington's Cabinet, given to guide the President's official action, he used this language:

To lay taxes to provide for the general welfare of the United States is to lay taxes for the purpose of providing for the general welfare.

If taxes can be laid for the purpose of providing for the general welfare, why may they not be expended for that purpose? Does it help the general welfare to gather money into the Treasury to lock it up under a construction of the Constitution which makes Congress powerful enough to collect the money yet impotent to disburse it? I read further from Mr. Jefferson:

For the laying of taxes is the power and the general welfare the purpose for which the power is to be exercised. Congress are not to lay taxes ad libitum for any purpose they please, but only to pay the debts or provide for the welfare of the Union. In like manner they are not to do anything they please to provide for the general welfare—

"In like manner"—I repeat the quotation—"they are not to do anything they please to provide for the general welfare," as contended by the Senator from Texas—

But only to lay taxes for that purpose.

The language which I have quoted from Mr. Jefferson shows that the distinction which Mr. Monroe took was correct, and that the one which I insisted upon in my first argument upon this subject is also correct, that there is a power granted in the Constitution to levy taxes and to appropriate money for the general welfare, without conceding as an inseparable incident to that power, as contended for by the Senator from Texas, another, a distinct, substantive, and independent power to control the object for which the appropriation is made.

I will read further from Mr. Jefferson. I have almost quoted his words in what I have just said. After saying that to provide for the general welfare does not authorize the Congress to do anything else but to lay taxes for that purpose and pay it out, he proceeds:

To consider the latter phrase—

That is, to provide for the general welfare—not as describing the purpose of the first—

Which is to levy taxes—

but as giving a distinct and independent power to do any act they please which might be for the good of the Union would render all the preceding and subsequent enumerations of power completely useless.

That is the very position which I announced in my first speech upon this bill. I repudiated the idea that a substantive and independent power could be got from these words expressly upon the ground stated by Mr. Jefferson; that to concede that would be to wipe out all the balance of the Constitution and leave Congress an unlimited power, exactly the same power which the Senator who sits before me conceives that it has with reference to the land of the United States. These are Mr. Jefferson's views.

Now let us see what were in fact Mr. Monroe's views. I have not only Mr. Monroe's words here, about which there can be no mistake, but I have the construction put upon them by Judge Story, and a similar construction was put upon them by the great author of modern Democracy, Andrew Jackson himself.

Mr. Monroe says, referring to this same grant of power to lay taxes "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," and referring to the latter part of that grant—I quote from first Story on the Constitution, section 980:

SEC. 980. That the second part of this grant gives a right to appropriate the public money, and nothing more, is evident from the following considerations.

Then he goes on to argue at length, and Judge Story, in a note to this same section, says:

There is no doubt that President Washington fully concurred in this opinion, as his repeated recommendations to Congress of objects of this sort, especially of the encouragement of manufactures, of learning—

It seems that General Washington recommended to the consideration of Congress the encouragement of learning under the taxing power of the Constitution or the appropriating power of the Constitution—of a university, of new inventions, of agriculture, of commerce and navigation, of a military academy, abundantly prove.

I proceed further to read from Mr. Monroe. I admit that this is dreary reading; I admit that I am consuming to a very large extent the time of the Senate in reading at length this authority; but I read none of it in my first argument, and the Senator who replied to it has selected certain phrases disconnected from the context, and he claims for them that they have a meaning different from that which Mr. Monroe expressed fully and freely in this message.

In the next place, because, if the clause in question—

That is the taxing clause—is not construed merely as an authority to appropriate the public money, it must be obvious that it conveys a power of indefinite and unlimited extent—

Just as Mr. Jefferson said—that there would have been no use for the special powers to raise and support armies and a navy, to regulate commerce, to call forth the militia, or even to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. An unqualified power to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare, as the second part of this clause would be if considered as a distinct and separate grant, would extend to every object in which the public could be interested.

That is the construction which I repudiate. That is the construction which the Senator from Texas says is the inevitable and logical necessity if we were to make the appropriation proposed in this bill.

A power to provide for the common defense would give to Congress the command of the whole force, &c.

Then, in section 981, in further argument of this question, he uses this language:

But the use or application of the money after it is raised is a power altogether of a different character. It imposes no burden on the people, nor can it act on them in a sense to take power from the States.

The power to appropriate money can not act, says Mr. Monroe, upon the people of the States or upon the States themselves in the sense of taking power from them; yet the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] argued with great force that the two powers were inseparable; that they could not be divorced.

Again, turning to section 985 of Story on the Constitution, I find these words, being still the language of President Monroe:

SEC. 985. It is contended on the one side that, as the National Government is a government of limited powers, it has no right to expend money except in the performance of acts authorized by the other specific grants according to a strict construction of their powers—

Exactly the position which the Senator from Texas takes—that this grant, in neither of its branches, gives to Congress a discretionary power of any kind, but is a mere instrument in its hands to carry into effect the powers contained in the other grants.

That is the exact position taken by the Senator from Texas before me [Mr. COKE] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] who addressed the Senate yesterday evening. But what does Mr. Monroe say:

To this construction I was inclined in the more early stage of our Government; but on further reflection and observation my mind has undergone a change, for reasons which I will frankly unfold.

Sir, I took the exact position he did when I said that the inclination of my mind, if it was a new question, was to deny the power, but I was obliged to change because the practice of the Government had been to the contrary. But Mr. Monroe did not place his change alone upon the practice of the Government. He goes on to argue at great length and with great force to show that his first position was unsustainable. Let it be remembered here, and not be forgotten, that when this message was written Mr. Calhoun, the great author of Southern States' rights, was a member of Mr. Monroe's Cabinet, and it is to be presumed that he must have consented to so important a document as this.

In respect to the construction put upon this clause by the Senator from Texas says Mr. Monroe: "I was inclined to in the more early stages of our Government, but on further reflection and observation my mind has undergone a change for reasons which I will frankly unfold." I will read some of those reasons, though I am not bound from the position which I took in the first instance to defend that construction of the Constitution except upon the idea that it has been acquiesced in for so long a time that we are not at liberty to disregard it; but it is well to know that it is the construction assumed by Mr. Jefferson, General Washington, Mr. Monroe, and every other President to the time of General Jackson, including him, and that they had reasons, and good and plausible reasons, for the ground upon which they stood. Says Mr. Monroe, section 986 of Story on the Constitution:

SEC. 986. The grant consists, as heretofore observed, of a twofold power: the first to raise and the second to appropriate the public money; and the terms used in both instances are general and unqualified. Each branch was obviously drawn with a view to the other, and the import of each tends to illustrate that of the other. The grant to raise money gives a power over every subject from which revenue may be drawn, and is made in the same manner with the grants to declare war, to raise and support armies and a navy, to regulate commerce, to establish post-offices and post-roads, and with all the other specific grants to the General Government. In the discharge of the powers contained in any of these grants there is no other check than that which is to be found in the great principles of our system, the responsibility of the representative to his constituents—

The very position which I announced in my speech.

If war, for example, is necessary, and Congress declare it for good cause, their constituents will support them in it.

Again, he says, in the same section:

The power to raise money by taxes, duties, imposts, and excises is alike unqualified; nor do I see any check on the exercise of it other than that which applies to the other powers above recited, the responsibility of the representative to his constituents.

Again, in section 987, Mr. Monroe proceeds:

If we look to the second branch of this power, that which authorizes the appropriation of the money thus raised, we find that it is not less general and unqualified than the power to raise it. More comprehensive terms than to "pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare" could not have been used. So intimately connected with and dependent on each other are these two branches of power, that had either been limited the limitation would have had a like effect on the other. Had the power to raise money been conditional or restricted to special purposes—

As contended for by the Senator from Texas who sits before me [Mr. COKE]— the appropriation must have corresponded with it; for none but the money raised could be appropriated, nor could it be appropriated to other purposes than those which were permitted. On the other hand, if the right of appropriation had been restricted to certain purposes, it would be useless and improper to raise more than would be adequate to those purposes. It may fairly be inferred—

Says Mr. Monroe—

that these restraints or checks—

Which the Senator from Texas says exist in the Constitution—

have been carefully and intentionally avoided. The power in each branch is alike broad and unqualified, and each is drawn with peculiar fitness to the other, the latter requiring terms of great extent and force to accommodate the former, which have been adopted, and both placed in the same clause and sentence. Can it be presumed that all these circumstances were so nicely adjusted by mere accident? Is it not more just to conclude that they were the result of due deliberation and design? Had it been intended that Congress should be restricted in the appropriation of the public money to such expenditures as were authorized by a rigid construction of the other specific grants, how easy would it have been to have provided for it by a declaration to that effect. The omission of such declaration is therefore an additional proof that it was not intended that the grant should be so construed.

In section 988, in speaking of these same two powers, the power to levy taxes and the power to appropriate money, Mr. Monroe says:

SEC. 988. It was evidently impossible to have subjected this grant in either branch—

Either as to the raising of the money or the appropriation of the money—to such restriction—

The restriction contended for by the Senator from Texas—without exposing the Government to very serious embarrassment. How carry it into effect?

Says he:

If the grant had been made in any degree dependent upon the States the Government would have experienced the fate of the Confederation. Like it, it would have withered and soon perished.

* * * * * * * *

Had it been declared by a clause in the Constitution that the expenditures under this grant should be restricted to the construction which might be given of the other grants—

The very position taken by the Senator from Texas—

such restraint, though the most innocent, could not have failed to have had an injurious effect on the vital principles of the Government, and often on its most important measures.

So Mr. Monroe says that the construction contended for by my friend from Texas, if adopted, could but have the most injurious effect upon the vital principles of the Government, and often on its most important measures.

Mr. Monroe continues:

Those who might wish to defeat a measure proposed might construe the power relied on in support of it in a narrow and contracted manner, and in that way fix a precedent inconsistent with the true import of the grant. At other times, those who favored a measure might give to the power relied on a forced or strained construction, and, succeeding in the object, fix a precedent in the opposite extreme. Thus it is manifest that, if the right of appropriation be confined to that limit—

That is the limit of the other specific grants of power in the Constitution—measures may oftentimes be carried or defeated by considerations and motives altogether independent of and unconnected with their merits, and the several powers of Congress receive constructions equally inconsistent with their true import. No such declaration, however, has been made; and, from the fair import of the grant, and, indeed, its positive terms, the inference that such was intended seems to be precluded.

Mr. Monroe's position is that putting this construction—the one which I contend for and which is denied by the Senator from Texas—upon that clause in the Constitution has the effect not as insisted upon by the Senator from Texas to expand the powers of the Government, but quite a contrary effect, for if that construction, the construction contended for by the Senator from Texas, be adopted, argues Mr. Monroe, then it would result that when an appropriation is manifestly needed for some particular purpose, when the public necessity demands it, and the common defense and the general welfare impel every man to vote for it and can not look for a power under these terms to make the grant, Congress will resort to some other power, and in construing that power enlarge it unduly beyond the terms of the Constitution.

So the construction contended for by Mr. Monroe is not one of enlarging the powers of Congress, but quite the contrary. He proceeds further in section 989:

Many considerations of great weight operate in favor of this construction, while I do not perceive any serious objection to it. If it be established, it follows that the words "to provide for the common defense and general welfare" have a definite, safe, and useful meaning. The idea of their forming an original grant with unlimited power, superseding every other grant, is abandoned.

And that is exactly my position.

They will be considered simply as conveying a right of appropriation—

Not the right, as contended for by the Senator from Texas, of jurisdiction and control, but simply and solely the right of appropriation—

a right—

a right indispensable to that of raising a revenue and necessary to expenditures under every grant. By it, as already observed, no new power will be taken from the States, the money to be appropriated being raised under a power already granted to Congress. By it, too, the motive for giving a forced or strained construction to any of the other specific grants will in most instances be diminished, and in many utterly destroyed. The importance of this consideration can not be too highly estimated, since, in addition to the examples already given, it ought particularly to be recollected that, to whatever extent any specific power may be carried, the right of jurisdiction goes with it, pursuing it through all its incidents.

That is true, he says, with reference to the specific grants in the Constitution, but he denies it with reference to this:

The very important agency which this grant has in carrying into effect every other grant is a strong argument in favor of the construction contended for. All the other grants are limited by the nature of the offices which they have severally to perform, each conveying a power to do a certain thing, and that only.

I am nearly through reading from Mr. Monroe, but it is important. As the Senator from Texas asserted that I had no just authority for stating Mr. Monroe was in favor of the view which I advocated, it seemed it was demanded of me to make this proof complete and irresistible.

If then—

Says he—

the right to raise and appropriate the public money is not restricted to the expenditures under the other specific grants, according to a strict construction of their powers respectively, is there no limitation to it?

The Senator from Texas says there is none; he says that unless the limitation is found in the other specific grants of the Constitution the right of appropriation of money out of the Treasury, like his new-fangled idea of the autocratic power of Congress over the public domain and other property belonging to the Union, is absolutely unrestrained and unlimited. Now, let us see what Mr. Monroe says on that subject:

Have Congress a right to raise and appropriate the public money to any and to every purpose, according to their will and pleasure? They certainly have not. The Government of the United States is a limited government, instituted for great national purposes, and for those only. Other interests are committed to the States, whose duty it is to provide for them. Each government should look to the great and essential purposes for which it was instituted, and confine itself to those purposes. A State government will rarely—

He does not say, like the Senator from Texas, it can not, but it will rarely exercise an admitted and conceded power of the State to apply money to national purposes—

if ever apply money to national purposes without making it a charge to the nation. The people of the State would not permit it.

He does not say a State can not do it, but that it will not do it from motives of self-interest. It will not tax its own people for national purposes, and so he says:

Nor will Congress be apt to apply money in aid of the State administrations for purposes strictly local—

Not that it has not the power to do it, as contended for by the Senator, but that having the power it will not be apt to exercise it for mere local purposes—in which the nation at large has no interest, although the State should desire it. The people of the other States would condemn it. They would declare that Congress had no right to tax them for such a purpose, and dismiss at the next election such of their representatives as had voted for the measure, especially if it should be severely felt.

That is his limitation on that power, the responsibility of the representative to his constituents. Will the Senator say that this object of education, considering the condition of many of the States, especially in that section of the Union in which he and I reside, is a mere local measure, not connected with the general welfare of the whole Union, and of every man, woman, and child in it? I suppose he will not say that.

Now I come to the last quotation which I shall make from Mr. Monroe; and that is in regard to the practice of the Government, the ground on which I place my acquiescence in this construction of the power:

SEC. 991. In regard to the practice of the Government, it has been entirely in conformity to the principles here laid down. Appropriations have never been limited by Congress to cases falling within the specific powers enumerated in the Constitution.

That was the fact from Washington down to the days of Monroe, asserted by him, and asserted with the acts named, and page and book referred to by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND], and which the Senator from Texas saw proper entirely to overlook in the speech which he made on this subject.

Appropriations—

Says Mr. Monroe—

have never been limited by Congress to cases falling within the specific powers enumerated in the Constitution, whether those powers be construed in their broad or their narrow sense—

No latitude of construction, says Mr. Monroe, has been sufficient to cover the appropriations made by Congress—and in an especial manner appropriations have been made to aid internal improvements of various sorts, in our roads, our navigation, our streams, and other objects of a national character and importance. In some cases, not silently but upon discussion, Congress have gone the length of making appropriations to aid destitute foreigners and cities laboring under severe calamities—

Will the Senator from Texas point out among the specific grants of the Constitution the one under which appropriations of that sort can be made?

as in the relief of the St. Domingo refugees in 1794—

I believe George Washington was President in 1794 and he signed the bill, and if I err I happen to be in the best company in the world, with George Washington and his Secretary of State, Jefferson, and with Mr. Monroe, and, as I will show, with that other great leader of the Democracy, Andrew Jackson. He gives instances as follows:

As in the relief of the St. Domingo refugees in 1794, and the citizens of Venezuela, who suffered from an earthquake in 1812. An illustration equally forcible of a domestic character is in the bounty given in the cod-fisheries, which was strenuously resisted on constitutional grounds in 1792—

I believe Washington was President then—but which still maintains its place in the statute-book of the United States.

As Washington said by his approval of that bill, and as our predecessors and we ourselves, by allowing the act to remain on the statute-book, assert that we may pay bounties to cod-fisheries. Then can we not make an appropriation to aid the States in removing from their limits ignorance and its consequent vice? I will read now from a note by Judge Story to this last quotation; and I have a right to refer to it, because the Senator alluded to him in his speech as a great constitutional lawyer, and he was. He was appointed, I believe, on the bench by President Jefferson. Says Judge Story, in a note:

It would be impracticable to enumerate all these various objects of appropriation in detail. Many of them will be found enumerated in President Monroe's exposition of 4th of May, 1822, pages 41 to 45. The annual appropriation acts speak a very strong language on this subject. Every President of the United States except President Madison seems to have acted upon the same doctrine. President Jefferson can hardly be deemed an exception. In his early opinion, already quoted (4 Jefferson's Corresp., 524), he manifestly maintained it. In his message to Congress (2d December, 1806, Wait's State Papers, 457, 458), he seems to have denied it. In signing the bill for the Cumberland road, on the 29th March, 1806 (acts of 1806, chapter 19), he certainly gave it a partial sanction, as well as upon other occasions. See Mr. Monroe's exposition on 4th May, 1822, page 41. But see 4 Jefferson's Corresp., 457, where Mr. Jefferson adopts an opposite reasoning. President Jackson has adopted it with manifest reluctance; but he considers it as firmly established by the practice of the Government. See his veto message on the Maysville road bill (27th May, 1830, 4 Elliott's Deb., 333 to 335).

I adopt it with manifest reluctance; but the reluctance shows the power of the circumstances which force the construction upon the action and mind of the party. I have not Jackson's message here, as my friend from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] has, and I should be glad if he would here read to the Senate the expressions of Andrew Jackson upon this subject.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I propose to read, as requested by the Senator from Mississippi, from the Maysville road bill veto of General Jackson, remarking that that veto was mainly on two grounds, one that the road was strictly local, starting from a point on the Ohio River and running forty or fifty miles in the interior in the same State; the other, that the condition of the Treasury did not justify the appropriation until the payment of the public debt. On the questions connected with the argument of the Senator from Mississippi I will read from General Jackson's veto message, as follows:

The ground taken at an early period of the Government was that whenever money has been raised by the general authority, and is to be applied to a particular measure, a question arises whether the particular measure be within the enumerated authorities vested in Congress. If it be, the money requisite for it may be applied to it; if not, no such application can be made. The document in which this principle was first advanced is of deservedly high authority, and should be held in grateful remembrance for its immediate agency in rescuing the country from much existing abuse and for its conservative effect upon some of the most valuable principles of the Constitution. The symmetry and purity of the Government would doubtless have been better preserved if this restriction of the power of appropriation could have been maintained without weakening its ability to fulfill the general objects of its institution, an effect so likely to attend its admission, notwithstanding its apparent fitness, that every subsequent administration of the Government, embracing a period of thirty out of forty-two years of its existence, has adopted a more enlarged construction of the power. It is not my purpose to detain you by a minute recital of the acts which sustain this assertion, but it is proper that I should notice some of the most prominent, in order that the reflections which they suggest to my mind may be better understood.

In the administration of Mr. Jefferson we have two examples of the exercise of the right of appropriation which in the consideration that led to their adoption and in their effects upon the public mind, have had a greater agency in marking the character of the power than any subsequent events. I allude to the payment of $15,000,000 for the purchase of Louisiana and to the original appropriation for the construction of the Cumberland road, the latter act deriving much weight from the acquiescence and approbation of three of the most powerful of the original members of the confederacy, expressed through their respective Legislatures. Although the circumstances of the latter case may be such as to deprive so much of it as relates to the actual construction of the road of the force of an obligatory exposition of the Constitution, it must, nevertheless, be admitted that so far as the mere appropriation of money is concerned they present the principle in its most imposing aspect. No less than twenty-three different laws have been passed through all the forms of the Constitution, appropriating upward of two millions and a half of dollars out of the national Treasury in support of that improvement, with the approbation of every President of the United States, including my predecessor, since its commencement.

The views of Mr. Monroe upon this subject were not left to inference. During his administration a bill was passed through both Houses of Congress conferring the jurisdiction and prescribing the mode by which the Federal Government should exercise it in the case of the Cumberland road. He returned it with objections to its passage, and in assigning them took occasion to say that in the early stages of the Government he had inclined to the construction that it had no right to expend money, except in the performance of acts authorized by the other specific grants of power, according to a strict construction of them; but that on further reflection and observation his mind had undergone a change; that his opinion then was "that Congress have an unlimited power to raise money, and that in its appropriation they have a discretionary power, restricted only by the duty to appropriate it to purposes of common defense and of general not local, national, not State benefit;" and this was avowed to be the governing principle through the residue of his administration. The views of the last administration are of such recent date as to render a particular reference to them unnecessary. It is well known that the appropriating power, to the utmost extent which had been claimed for it in relation to internal improvements, was fully recognized and exercised by it.

This brief reference to known facts will be sufficient to show the difficulty, if not impracticability, of bringing back the operations of the Government to the construction of the Constitution set up in 1793, assuming that to be its true reading in relation to the power under consideration, thus giving an admonitory proof of the force of implication, and the necessity of guarding the Constitution with sleepless vigilance against the authority of precedents which have not the sanction of its most plainly defined powers. For although it is the duty of all to look to that sacred instrument instead of the statute-book, to repudiate at all times encroachments upon its spirit, which are too apt to be effected by the conjuncture of peculiar and facilitating circumstances, it is not less true that the public good and the nature of our political institutions require that individual differences should yield to a well-settled acquiescence of the people and confederated authorities in particular constructions of the Constitution on doubtful points. Not to concede this much to the spirit of our institutions would impair their stability and defeat the objects of the Constitution itself.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am very much obliged to the Senator from Georgia for reading these extracts from the message of General Jackson. It will be seen that General Jackson adds to the force of the position upon which I rested my acquiescence in this construction the duty of Congress and the President to acquiesce in the settled construction of the Constitution. He says, different from my friend from Texas who sits before me and from the Senator from Delaware who spoke yesterday, that we can not set up our individual and private opinions against a settled construction of the Constitution placed on it by Congress after Congress and by every department of the Government. He also states the opinion of Mr. Monroe as developed in the document I have read and illustrated in actual practice by his administration.

Now, sir, I have made good my first position that there was power under the grants in the Federal Constitution to Congress to make the appropriation proposed in this bill. I have made it good by the opinion of Jefferson and of Monroe and of Washington and by the practice of every Congress from the beginning down to the present time, and I have shown, too, by the message of General Jackson that when such construction has been put upon the powers of Congress we are not at liberty to deny it. The Senator from Texas, notwithstanding that was the basis on which my first argument was made, never condescended to allude to that position. He did not think it worthy of his notice, notwithstanding it had the sanction of General Jackson, and very well he might think so, because the answer could not be found. Even his great abilities are unequal to the task.

I call his attention and I call the attention of the Senate and of the country to the other instances of the exercise of this power specified by the Senator from Arkansas. Here was a gift made since I have been in the Senate, passed unanimously, I suppose by the vote of the Senator who sits before me, giving $500,000 to the sufferers from the overflow of the Mississippi Valley in 1882. Where did the Senator get the power to do that unless he got it under the clause to which I have alluded? And during the present session of Congress we have passed a similar resolution giving $500,000 to the sufferers from the overflow in the Ohio River. That was passed unanimously, voted for of course by every Senator, including the Senator from Texas; and if that can be done, under what power can it be done except under the one to which I have alluded? There certainly is no authority for these appropriations in any other grant of power to Congress.

The Senator said—that was his position—that Congress could not appropriate money raised by taxation for the purposes of education. I challenged him to the proof of that position. He met the challenge, and this is the way he proved it: His first proof is a definition of taxes by Cooley, whom he describes as a great constitutional lawyer; and what is in that definition which excludes the power of Congress to make this appropriation? I read:

> Taxes are defined as being the enforced proportional contribution of persons and property, levied by the authority of the state for the support of the government—> and for all public needs.

That is not all—

Who is to decide what is a "public need?" The courts can not decide it. Will the Senator say that the education of the people is not a public need? If so, he denies the power of every State in the Union to levy a tax for that purpose, because the very book from which he reads is not a disquisition upon the powers of Federal taxation, but upon the powers of taxation generally in the States as well as in the Federal Government; and if the "public need" does not include education, then there is no power in any State of the Union to levy a tax for educational purposes. And yet when the Senator read that he considered that he had made great progress in the way of proving the unconstitutionality of this bill.

The next proof which the Senator made is found on page 9 of Cooley on Taxation:

> All these maxims assume that taxation is laid for the purpose of obtaining a revenue. Within the definitions given the burden would not be taxation if revenue were not the purpose.

Is this bill a bill for the purpose of raising taxes? Does the Senator from Texas urge that there is any provision in this bill which affects taxation and which raises revenue? Or does he contend that revenue means only money which can be used by the Government for the purpose of carrying out its specific powers? If he insists upon the latter as being the true rule, then I ask him where is his authority for such a position? Revenue does not define any purpose for which it shall be applied. It means simply the money which has been gathered or may be gathered into the Federal Treasury not only by taxation but by any other means by which it may be in the power of the Government to raise money. It may be raised from tolls; it may be raised from royalties on the mines; it may be raised from the Post-Office Department; it may be raised from the sale of land; and yet the Senator read gravely to the Senate yesterday that taxation must be for revenue, as a proof that we have no power to pass this bill, which simply provides for an appropriation of revenue. He either made no progress with his argument or he meant that the term "revenue" could only be applied to such portion of the money that might be raised as might be, ought to be, applied, as he contended, to the legitimate purposes of the Government. But money raised and in the Treasury is revenue, whether it be appropriated to one purpose or another; it is revenue even if it be stolen.

Then we go a little further. Let us see what his next proposition is; and, by the way, his great constitutional lawyer on the very next page says that taxes may be laid for some other purpose besides revenue, for the purpose of protecting industry. Of course I do not agree with him on that subject, nor does the Senator; but I mention that simply to show that the great constitutional authority which he brings here is somewhat mistaken in judgment, at least when tested by the Senator's opinions and by mine. The next authority which he read was from the same author. He read a long extract which is copied in his speech this morning, but he stopped just before he got to a clause which qualified and took back all that the author had said when applied to Federal taxation. This is what the author says after the quotation read by the Senator from Texas:

> This is the general rule; some apparent exceptions there unquestionably are, where the nation and the State have common interests and a common duty, such as may require the action of both—

Has not the State and the nation a common interest in removing illiteracy from among the people?—

> and would justify the levy of a tax by either or both to accomplish the one object. An illustration would be the case of a tax for the common defense against the public enemies, which might be levied by each, because the purpose would in a strict sense be public as to both.

How does the clause of the Constitution under consideration read? It reads:

> To pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

"Common defense" and "general welfare" being in the same clause, how can the Senator say that the Federal Government may aid the States in common defense and yet may not do so in the general welfare? They have been indissolubly joined together by the framers of the Constitution, and no man can divorce them. So, if the Federal Government may aid the States in their common defense, it may aid them in that which pertains to the general welfare.

Mr. COKE. If the Senator will allow me, because it is the duty of the General Government to defend the States against invasion. If an enemy should invade a State, does the Senator say that the General Government must wait until called upon before it could move against the invader? I do not understand it that way.

Mr. GEORGE. The gentleman says the difference arises in the difference in the duty. Would it not be the duty of the Federal Government just as well under this same clause of the Constitution, because no more power is conferred in reference to one than the other, to aid the State in reference to a measure for the general welfare of the people of the United States?

The words "common defense and general welfare" run all through the Constitution, and when they are not written they are implied. The very object of forming the Constitution, as recited in the preamble, was to provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare of the United States. Will the Senator say that where a specific power has been given under the Constitution to provide for the general welfare Congress may not exercise it, and yet it may exercise it when applied to the common defense? There is no authority for the distinction. I read the words "general welfare" as implied throughout the Constitution as a limitation upon all the powers granted by it. I say they are to be read everywhere in the Constitution as a limitation upon every power granted by the Constitution to Congress, just like they are inserted in reference to the first power, now more particularly in controversy—the power to collect taxes and appropriate them.

The Constitution gives Congress the power "to borrow money on the credit of the United States." Where is the limitation upon that power unless it be that the borrowing shall be "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States?" Does the Senator from Texas insist that there is an unlimited power to borrow money like there is an unlimited power, according to his views, to dispose of the land and other property of the United States?

To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

How must that power be exercised? According to the caprice of Congress, according to the wish and interests of any particular man, or shall it be exercised strictly in accordance with the provision inserted in the first clause, with a view to "the common defense and general welfare of the United States?"

So with naturalization; that must be done in the same way. Congress can not pass any naturalization law properly to aid any political party or to put down any political party or for the private end of any person in the United States. The power must be exercised as all other powers are, including (as I shall show before I get through) the power to dispose of the public domain for "the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

So with the grants of power "to establish post-offices and post-roads," "to coin money," "to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting," and "to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court." Are not these limited by the provision or the understanding or the implication that what they authorize must be done in accordance with and in subservience to the general welfare of the people of the United States? If not, Congress may establish a Federal court in every county in the United States, and put a judge there on a salary of $5,000 a year, and a marshal and a clerk, all paid for by taxation out of the people of the United States. There is no other limit upon this power except the judgment and discretion of Congress to exercise it only for the general welfare of the people of the United States.

So with reference to the power "to provide and maintain a navy," "to declare war," and "to raise and support armies." Has Congress an unlimited power in these respects? May it cover every sea with ironclads at an expense of billions of dollars to the people of the United States at its will? May it raise an army of 100,000 or 200,000 men, as is raised in Europe in times of peace? May it do these things? No, sir; the same limitation is implied upon the power of Congress in these respects as is implied in the first clause. Congress must act alone for the general welfare.

Not only is every power of Congress restricted in that way, but every power of the Executive. It is true he has the unlimited, the unrestricted power, if you will, of nominating whom he pleases to office, but the Constitution implies that in making his selections he shall select men whose services will be for the general welfare of the people of the United States. He has no right to select an officer upon any other ground. He has no right to select an officer because he is his friend, because he likes him, because he belongs simply to his own political party. It is true there is nothing in the Constitution which gives us a remedy against such an unworthy exercise of power. It is like the power defined by Mr. Monroe. Its limit is in the responsibility of the Executive to the people of the United States. This runs all the way through the Constitution.

If the Senator has established the proposition that the public lands can not be disposed of (and I will come to that directly) without reference to the general welfare of the United States, he has succeeded in establishing with reference to that something which does not exist with reference to any other power which is granted.

Then the Senator read from another authority, from Cooley. Here is what Judge Cooley says:

It is the first requisite of lawful taxation that the purpose for which it is laid shall be a public purpose.

I admit that; nobody who votes for this bill denies that. Will the Senator say that it is not a public purpose to educate the illiterate people of the States? If he does, as I before remarked with reference to another position which he took, the States themselves can not levy the tax, because the necessity for a public purpose is just as great in State taxation as it is in Federal taxation. On page 72, the page from which the Senator read, there are some other considerations on that subject which the Senator has not read and which I desire to read. Judge Cooley says:

A municipal government is one of delegated and limited powers, whose authority is generally to receive a somewhat strict construction, and which must find the purposes for which it may tax clearly confided to its charge by the State. It is not sufficient that a purpose may seem to belong properly to its jurisdiction, or that the court may believe it ought to have had authority over it, but it must be seen that the authority has been conferred in fact. It is otherwise with the State, which has all the power of taxation not withheld from exercise in the making of the State and Federal Constitutions and in support of whose action consequently the most liberal intendments are to be made. It is otherwise with the Federal Union also, for though its powers are not general like those of the State, but are limited and defined by the Federal Constitution, yet as they concern the most important matters of government and relate to subjects not of domestic concern merely but of international intercourse and to other matters which sometimes call for broad and comprehensive views and make a policy of liberal expenditures wise and statesmanlike, it would be neither reasonable nor prudent to subject its action in the matter of taxation to critical rules. That which it decides to be an object of public expenditure must generally be so accepted, and error in its action must be corrected by discussion and through public opinion and the elections.

I believe I have noticed all the citations which the Senator made with a view of proving his proposition that Congress could not appropriate money out of the Treasury as proposed by this bill. If I have omitted any it is because I can not now call them to mind. I will state that I did not receive a copy of the RECORD in which his speech is printed until after my arrival at the Senate, when it was nearly 12 o'clock, and I have not had time to read the Senator's speech as printed.

What is the Senator's proof that Congress has no power to pass this bill? First, that taxation must be for the public needs, and this is not a public need. Second, taxation must be for revenue, that is, to put money in the Treasury. Third, that it must be for a public purpose. This is not a public purpose, and that is all. That is the proof the Senator brings in favor of this proposition. Can any impartial man say this is sufficient proof to establish his proposition?

I have done with that part of the Senator's argument, and I come to his other point. I may as well call the attention of the Senator, before I proceed to the other part of his argument, to the fact that in the respective positions which the Senator and I at one time in this debate occupied, it seems to me from his speech that we have changed places. In my first argument on this subject I placed the power to pass this bill exactly where I place it now. I assailed the position taken by the Senator that Congress has unlimited power of disposition of the public domain, to give it to any public or private purpose, and asked for his authority for that position. He read, interrupting me, as follows:

Mr. COKE—

Interrupting me—

I stated that Congress had the power to make donations of land in aid of education in the States, and I stated it upon the authority of section 3, article 4, of the Constitution, which reads:

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

He said in his speech to which I replied that Congress had not the constitutional authority under the taxing clause. Now it appears, unless I have misunderstood his speech of yesterday, that my position is that the power comes from the clause just quoted as read by him, and that his position is a very different one from that. If I misunderstand the Senator he can correct me.

Mr. COKE. I will not interrupt the Senator to correct him now.

Mr. GEORGE. I say that it seems now in his last argument to be his position that this clause of the Constitution only referred to land and other property owned by the United States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. Is that the Senator's view?

Mr. COKE. That is a part of it. The Supreme Court of the United States in the Dred Scott case determined that. I stated in my remarks yesterday that the commentators upon the Constitution still regard that clause as referring to public lands acquired since the formation of the Constitution, and that it made no difference whether they were right or wrong. Whether they were right and the Supreme Court were wrong, or the other way, the argument of the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott case sustained the right of Congress to dispose of land acquired since the Constitution was framed just as fully and plenarily as that Congress could have disposed of the land before acquired.

Mr. GEORGE. I understood the Senator to say that the power of the disposition of public property now rested as an incident to ownership, the jus disponendi, as I understood him to say.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. GEORGE. Of course.

Mr. COKE. The power to apply property acquired since the formation of the Constitution would carry with it the jus disponendi, whether the clause of the Constitution which the Senator has just read were there or not, and so whether it refers to lands acquired subsequent to the formation of the Constitution or not makes no difference. That is my position.

Mr. GEORGE. Your position then is, as I understand it, that Congress has the power under this clause to make any disposition that it may see proper with reference to subsequently acquired property, and that it has the same power as incident to its ownership. I understand that to be the Senator's position.

We will see what the Supreme Court has said in the celebrated case of Dred Scott. By the way, I was a little astonished at this late day, when I consider all that has occurred since the decision of the Dred Scott case, that that case should be cited as an authority for the powers of Congress in reference to the public domain. That case, as I understood, decided two things which belong now to the history of the past: first, that Congress had no power to exclude slavery from the Territories; second, that a man or woman of African descent was not and could not be a citizen of the United States. Both of those points have been overruled they have been expunged, one by constitutional amendment and the other by the adoption of a contrary construction of that instrument. But there is a very important statement made in the opinion which I desire to call to the attention of the Senate, especially in this case referred to by the Senator from Texas, to show that whatever else it may decide it decides this also. Says the court in its opinion:

A power, therefore, in the General Government to obtain and hold colonies and dependent territories over which they might legislate without restriction would be inconsistent with its own existence in its present form. Whatever it acquires it acquires for the benefit of the people of the several States who created it. It is their trustee, acting for them, and charged with the duty of promoting the interests of the whole people of the Union in the exercise of the powers specifically granted.

So this decision overturns the favorite theory of my friend from Texas that as to the public domain the Congress is without any restriction; that it may make any disposition of it that it sees proper.

Now, I propose to address myself to that subject to see how the law stands. The Senator says that under the authority of the jus disponendi as an incident to ownership and under the provision of the Constitution in relation to making rules and regulations concerning the public property and the power to dispose of the land and other property of the Union the power of Congress is absolute, unlimited, to make disposition to any purpose it may see proper; and it is upon that ground the Senator justifies the donation of land for the purpose of education in the States. I say that Congress, the Government of the United States, has no property, can have none, except in trust for the people of the United States. There is no such thing in this country as an autocratic and unlimited power in the Federal Government with reference to anything. Every power which Congress has, every power which any agency of the Federal Government has, even that Government itself, its own existence, depends upon the Constitution. It was created by the Constitution. Destroy the Constitution, and you have no Government of the United States. Every function, every power, every prerogative it possesses, every species of property which it can hold or acquire it possesses and holds and acquires under the Constitution and for the purposes mentioned in the Constitution, and for no other purpose whatever.

If that be true, what becomes of the doctrine of the Senator from Texas, that as to the public domain Congress has unlimited, absolute, autocratic power? Under his view, and I charged it on him in the argument which I first made, Congress might donate the public land to its own henchmen, to its own favorites; it might donate it for immoral purposes, it might donate it to a crowned head in Europe, and the Senator did not deny it, but claimed that the jus disponendi, existing in the United States as it existed in a private individual, authorized Congress to make any disposition of this property that it saw proper. That is a doctrine before unheard-of in this country, and it is without warrant in the Constitution. He read from Kent to prove that. Let us see what it proved.

Said the Senator, reading from Kent:

> Congress have the exclusive right of pre-emption to all Indian lands lying within the territories of the United States. This was so decided in the case of Johnson vs. McIntosh. Upon the doctrine of the court in that case, and in that of Fletcher vs. Peck, the United States own the soil as well as the jurisdiction of the immense tracts of unpatented lands included within their territories and of all the productive funds which those lands may hereafter create. The title is in the United States by the treaty of peace with Great Britain and by subsequent cessions from France and Spain, and by cessions from the individual States, and the Indians have only a right of occupancy, and the United States possess the legal title subject to that occupancy, and with an absolute and exclusive right—

Not to dispose of it as it might see proper, as was argued by the Senator from Texas, but—> to extinguish the Indian title of occupancy either by conquest or purchase.

"The absolute and exclusive right"——

Mr. COKE. Read on.

Mr. GEORGE. I will. The Senator invites me to read on, and I will read on the next page and I will read beyond that, because I think it is fair to an author to read all he says upon a subject in order to ascertain what his meaning is. On the next page Chancellor Kent says:

> The Constitution gave to Congress the power to dispose of and to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States, and to admit new States into the Union. Since the Constitution was formed, the value and efficacy of this power have been magnified to an incalculable extent by the purchase of Louisiana and Florida; and, under the doctrine contained in the cases I have referred to, Congress have a large and magnificent portion of territory under their absolute control and disposal.

The Senator says from that absolute control and disposal they may make any disposition of it which they see proper. Now let us see what Chancellor Kent says on the next pageta fer this last. If the Senator had pursued his studies a little further he would have discovered that that great judge never gave the sanction of his name to such a heresy in constitutional law as that Congress had an absolute, unrestricted, and unlimited power over anything; that all Congress possesses is a grant by the Constitution for the purposes named in the Constitution, and that is for the common defense and general welfare of the people of the Union. Speaking of the lands now owned by the United States, Chancellor Kent said:

> The lands so ceded were intended to be, and were considered, as constituting a common fund, for the benefit of the Union.

Not, as the Senator from Texas says, considered and conceded to be a fund at the private disposal of the Congress of the United States and of the Government of the United States according to its will and pleasure. So that sustains the same doctrine that the Dred Scott case sustains. The Dred Scott case says that the United States is a trustee of this domain. Was it ever heard before that a trustee could dispose of the trust fund according to his private will and pleasure without reference to the interests of the cestui que trust? And who is the cestui que trust in this case? The people of the United States of America, the general welfare of the people, as suggested by my colleague [Mr. LAMAR]. I have said that that is the animating spirit of every clause and power in the Constitution; that it must be read, whether expressed or not, between the lines which record and grant any power given to the United States. The power to declare war is unlimited in one sense, because there are no circumstances mentioned in the Constitution under which it should be declared; but the power must be exercised, as I have before said, under the limitation that it shall only be declared for the common defense and general welfare of the United States. So with every other power, as I have shown in a previous part of my argument.

Oh, but the Senator says that his position is based on precedents. When I quoted precedent after precedent, when the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] brought up precedent after precedent and ransacked the whole statute law of this Government as authority for the exercise by Congress of the power claimed in this bill, the Senator did not even consider that those precedents were worth his notice; but when he launches upon this new-fangled idea of the unlimited autocratic power of Congress with reference to the public property he resorts to precedents. Let us see what his precedents amount to.

Gift of the land for homesteads is one. Does the Senator say that that includes the power, and is derived from its exercise by the General Government, to make a disposition of the public land for the private welfare of any individual? If so, he has found a power that nowhere else exists in the Constitution. It is true the recipient of the land is a private individual who has received a private benefit, just as the recipient of a pension receives a private benefit; but for what purpose can we grant a pension, for what purpose can we grant land to a private individual? It is only for this purpose, that we do before we make the grant decide that the particular grant will be for the general welfare of the United States, and of course that it happens to be also for the private welfare of the individual does not destroy its character as being for the general welfare. The only means by which we can reach the general welfare is to make the private welfare of everybody else consistent with it. There is no such thing as a visionary, floating, general welfare that does not touch the population of the United States. The general welfare is compounded and made up of the private welfare, not of single individuals here and there, but of the private welfare of the great mass of the American people.

The grant of a homestead to a man is made not because Congress wants to benefit that particular man, but because the Government desires to have the public land settled, improved, to bring the waste places of this country into civilization, and join them in the march of progress with the other portions of the country; and this grant is not made, as the Senator would assume, to any particular class of individuals, all others being excepted; it is not made to all the men who live in Massachusetts, excluding those who live in Texas; it is not made to men having a particular lineage, all other lineages being excluded; it is not made to men having a particular profession or calling, excluding other professions or callings; but it is an offer to every man in the United States who is 21 years of age to go upon the public land and settle on it and remain there for a certain length of time and then have it. That is what it is, and it is not private in any particular; it is general. The Senator can go, I can go, every citizen of the United States can go and perform for the Government—no, not for the Government, but perform for the people of the United States the great benefit and blessing of extending commerce and civilization and our free institutions in the waste places in our far West. Does that prove that, because this grant may be made in that way, land may be granted at the autocratic will and power of Congress to anybody? No, sir.

Bounty lands are given. They are given in the same way that pensions are given. Although a grant of bounty land operates as a private benefit to every individual who receives it, it is given upon the idea that the donation of these lands will operate to the general welfare by encouraging in time of war men to volunteer and defend their country.

Right here in the speech of the Senator from Texas on yesterday the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] interposed, whose attention, I have no doubt, was called to this debate by hearing the words "taxation for revenue," for it seems the Senator from Kentucky dreams of "revenue," "taxation for revenue," "tariff for revenue," "sees" it "in clouds," "hears" it "in the wind;" it is his morning lullaby, if I may so say, and his last requiem at night. When those portentous words had been pronounced by the Senator from Texas, "taxation for revenue," the Senator from Kentucky was no longer able to keep his silence, and so he put in an interrogatory which he thought, I suppose, settled the whole principle, and that was this: he asked me if I thought that Congress could donate money to a private individual. If I were to answer that it could not donate money to a private individual, he supposed that he had made out his case; that there was a distinction between land and money.

Well, now, Mr. President, Congress has donated money; it does donate money to private individuals. The other House of Congress, with a sturdy Democratic majority, has recently passed a bill donating to the Mexican veterans, each one of them, $96 a year. The Senator from Texas will vote for that bill when it comes up here and so will I. But then I might ask the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Texas who sits before me if Congress could give the money for which it sold a quarter-section of land to the same individuals and under the same circumstances that it could give the land? The Senator from Texas argues, if I did not misunderstand him, that the power of Congress, either under the jus disponendi principle or under that clause of the Constitution to which he alluded, giving to Congress authority to dispose of land and other property, remains just the same as to the money for which the land may be sold as to the land itself. If I am wrong the Senator can correct me. I know I am right, because the Senator voted for a bill in 1880 which donated the proceeds of the sales of the public lands to education, absolutely to education.

Then I might ask him and ask the Senator from Kentucky, since the power of Congress is just as absolute and autocratic over the proceeds of land as it is over the land itself, what prevents Congress from giving to anybody it sees proper, to all our friends and relatives, to those we like, to those who voted for us and who fought political battles for us, $200 apiece out of the proceeds of the public lands, that being exactly the value of a quarter-section of public land at a dollar and a quarter an acre? How are you going to work that with your autocratic and unlimited power over the proceeds of the sales of the public lands and over the lands themselves?

But here I want to call the attention of the Senator from Texas and the attention of the Senate to the main point in controversy upon this subject. I do not care, it is not necessary for my argument, because I do not place the power to make this donation under the clause of the Constitution to which the Senator alludes—I do not care so far as my argument is concerned, though I should like very much if the Senator would answer whether Congress has autocratic power over the land or not. That is not the point in issue between the Senator and myself. He very ingeniously, I thought, evaded the real point in controversy. This is the hinging point of the controversy between the Senator and myself, and though I tried and the Senator from Arkansas tried to get the Senator from Texas to answer the question, yet if he did it escaped me, and if he desires to answer when I put it again he can do so. The point in controversy between us is this, and I will read his words lest I might misstate him. He says:

> If the constitutional power exists in Congress to levy and collect taxes from the people for the purpose of partially defraying the expense of public schools in the States, it exists for the purpose of paying the entire cost of the public schools of all the States whenever Congress shall choose to exercise it.

That is the point to which I direct the attention of the Senator and of the Senate. He proceeded:

> I hold it to be an undeniable proposition that if Congress has the constitutional power to appropriate money for the public schools it also has the power to regulate its disbursement, to say who shall receive its benefits, and to appoint its own agents to distribute and administer it, and to prescribe in general and in detail how and where, and when, and to whom, and through whom, and upon what requirements and conditions it shall go. In other words, if it be admitted that Congress has the power to levy and collect taxes in order to raise revenue to be expended in the several States in maintaining public schools, I hold that the power of Congress to take charge of the subject of education in the States and control the children and the schools through Federal agencies and instrumentalities can not be controverted, because the powers of Congress are supreme wherever its jurisdiction extends.

That is his doctrine in reference to this bill; that is his doctrine in reference to the unlimited power of Congress as claimed by him, the autocratic power of Congress over the public domain. Why, sir, Congress may give it away in unlimited quantities to the States for the purposes of education, and when it does that the power to go on further is not conceded, but denied. In other words, Mr. President, the Constitution makes two grants of power: one to grant money to public schools, the other to grant land to public schools. From the one, the grant of money, as a necessary consequence, as a logical necessity, results, in the opinion of the Senator from Texas, the power to control and manage them and from the other no such power exists! I must confess that I have not been able to see why a power acting on land or the proceeds of land—for the Senator will admit that the proceeds of land are the same as the land itself—shall have no effect to give power to interfere with education in the States when the same identical power operating upon money raised by taxation has the extraordinary and pernicious effect to which the Senator has alluded. That is a proposition which the Senator has not proved, and which I take it is beyond his power or that of any other human being to prove.

The power to give in one instance means the power to interfere and control; the power to give in the other instance, derived from the same instrument, gives unlimited jurisdiction over the subject to which the appropriation pertains! If the Senator thinks there is any additional weight to his argument on that point from his new discovery of the power of jus disponendi on account of the ownership of the property or of the money for which land is sold by the Government, I respectfully call his attention to the fact that the Government owns the money also that is in the Treasury, and the jus disponendi would be as safe and as good and as strong in the one instance as in the other.

But it is said by the Senator from Texas that the Government gave lands to railroads. That looks like a private purpose. Why, sir, in the first place, a grant to a railroad is not exclusively for a private purpose. All tax laws which have been passed and enforced giving aid to railroad companies are based upon the idea that they are public as well as private, that the public have an interest in them, and so all the decisions of the courts which concede to the States the power to regulate the traffic on these roads are based on the idea that they are public. But the Government never granted to railroad companies any land upon the idea that it was to benefit exclusively the railroad. Every grant, so far as I know, was a grant of an alternate section lying along either side of the road within specified limits, the other sections being reserved to the United States, the price of them being doubled, and the grant was justified upon the ground that the United States would be indemnified for the odd-numbered sections of land which it granted by the increased value of the even-numbered sections which it retained. So the Senator can not get from that this idea of autocratic, monarchical, and unlimited power in Congress over the public domain. It does not exist.

So the position of the Senator from Texas, if I understand it, fails. According to the Senator, the United States has two kinds of property. It has money in the Treasury derived from taxation, that is one kind, and it also has money in the Treasury derived from other sources; it has wild, unappropriated land in the States and Territories; it has public buildings in all the States; it has this Capitol and the numerous public buildings in this city.

Let us enumerate this property again. On the one side standing solitary and alone in the Treasury of the United States is the money raised by taxation. The Senator says if you touch that under the general-welfare clause, if you make any disposition of that for the general welfare of the people of the United States not in pursuance of the specified and enumerated grants you destroy the Constitution; that only has this fatal and deadly effect upon our institutions. But as to any money that happens to be in the Treasury which is derived by patent fees, by post-office receipts—supposing them not to be taxes—by sales of the public lands, by sales of the public property, by captures in war, by private donations—as to all that the Government of the United States is absolute owner, not trustee, the people of the United States, having no interest in this, can not complain as to what Congress may do; but touch but the hair of the head of a dollar or the figure of Liberty on a dollar if it happen to get into their control by the taxing power, then the country is ruined! That is the position, I understand, of the Senator from Texas—a most remarkable one. If that be true, if this autocratic, unlimited power exists over all this property, then what prevents the United States having in practice what the Senator says it has already in theory, a government of unlimited powers so far as this property is concerned?

Let us see now what it may do, according to the view of that Senator. There is no restriction upon the powers of Congress when it comes to money that is derived from any other source than taxation. Congress may sell all this property and get money and do what it pleases with it; it may go begging throughout the world, making promises to the crowned heads of Europe for subserviency to them and get donations from them; it may go to the money kings in the market and buy their money by promises of influence and of benefaction; it may declare war against our weaker neighbor, Mexico, and capture all that magnificent country, with its splendid mines; it may go further, it may go to the Straits of Magellan and capture all South America, make the land and the mines the property of the United States, sell them, put the money in the Treasury, and after that it has unlimited power, and it may do what it pleases with the money thus obtained!

Mr. President, that seems to be a singular result of constitutional law; but what is worse than that was suggested by the question asked by the Senator from Arkansas yesterday. Not only that may be done, but the money in the Treasury raised by taxation may be expended for the purpose of acquiring new property. You can not touch a dollar of that before it is expended except for the specific purposes mentioned by the Senator from Texas, but having expended it to acquire property and having acquired property with it, then suddenly the United States by some sort of political necromancy has been invested with autocratic power over it.

I understand the Senator's position to be that it is only money raised by taxation that must be disposed of under constitutional limitations. What are you going to do with money that is borrowed on the credit of the United States? Can we go into the markets and borrow all the money that anybody may see proper to lend us, and as that money does not get into the Treasury by taxation have we unlimited power over it? If we have an unlimited power of borrowing money, what prevents it, if this is so according to that Senator's view? Then we have a Post-Office by which we can make a good deal of money. We can (supposing the revenue from the Post-Office is not taxation) pay the expenses of the Post-Office under the views stated by the Senator from Texas out of money raised by the United States from taxation, and we may make profit out of it. As to this money so raised we are autocrats; there is no responsibity, no limit to our power. And then comes another means of having money so recently sanctioned by the Supreme Court of the United States. We have nothing to do in order to make everybody rich, to make all our friends rich by this absolute, unlimited, and autocratic power, but to set the printing-presses to work and print all the greenbacks we want and put them into the Treasury. They are not revenue raised by taxation; they are there, as I understand, simply to relieve the people of taxation. They are put there as a substitute for taxation. I suppose now according to the Senator's argument as to all that currency the unrestricted jus disponendi applies, it not being raised by taxation, and over it we have this unlimited and autocratic power. As to the money raised by taxation the specific grants of the Constitution apply, but as to all the rest we are all of us, every one of us connected with the Federal Government, duplicates of the Czar of Russia. We may do what we please with it for our own present welfare and the welfare of our friends—the people and the general welfare having no claim on it whatever.

But the Senator from Texas was pressed by the Senator from Arkansas upon this proposition. The Senator from Arkansas said: You say you can not take the money raised by public taxation for public schools, but you can take it and buy land with it. So, according to that view, there being $105,000,000 involved in this bill, we can not give that to the States for the illiterate people of this country, but we can take it and buy Canada with it and the next day after we have made the purchase divide out the land for purpose of education. That is a very singular result of constitutional law, one that needs in order to support it more than the word or assertion of any Senator, however learned or however distinguished he may be.

But the Senator from Kentucky, having had his attention drawn to this question in the way which I have explained, volunteered an explanation on this subject, and it was about this: That while we can not take the money and buy property for the purpose of making the donation, yet having bought it for some other purpose and being the owner of it, then we can make the appropriation for education. That is pretty good logic; I do not object to that; but Mr. Monroe says that is exactly what we can do with money paid into the Treasury from taxation. He says there is no such thing as raising money confined to specific purposes; it is all raised for general purposes.

Now in section 981 of Story on the Constitution Mr. Monroe is quoted as saying this—and so the Senator from Kentucky has very good authority for the distinction which he took. Mr. Monroe says:

> But the use or application of the money after it is raised is a power altogether of a different character.

Meaning different from the power of taxation.

> It imposes no burden on the people, nor can it act on them in a sense to take power from the States, or in any sense in which power can be controverted or become a question between the two governments. The application of money raised under a lawful power is a right or grant which may be abused.

So, sir, to sustain Mr. Monroe, the distinguished Senator from Kentucky says that having acquired the land in a lawful way, though it can not be bought specifically for education, it may nevertheless be used in that way. I say his position is, the position of the Senator from Kentucky is, that having acquired the land in a lawful way we may use it for lawful purposes, though we could not use it specifically for those purposes. The same thing happens, according to Mr. Monroe, with reference to money raised by taxation. Having acquired it under an undisputed power of the Constitution to levy taxes, we may appropriate it to the lawful uses prescribed in the Constitution for the general welfare, among which I suppose now it will not be denied that the education of illiterates is included.

Mr. President, I have been speaking longer than I expected. There are so many serious errors, as it appears to me, on the other side of this question, that it would take some time to run them all down and to expose them. I am going to show now——

Mr. VOORHEES. Would it not suit the Senator before he leaves that point to allow me to ask him a question? This Government having paid seven millions of money for the purchase of Alaska, I ask whether the doctrine is tenable in his mind that, not being able under the Constitution to give $7,000,000 for school purposes, we might not now sell that territory and give the proceeds to a fund of this kind?

Mr. GEORGE. I suppose so, according to the argument made by the Senator from Texas and according to the views of the gentlemen who agree with him. We can do that all the time. You can not give the money, say they, but you can buy Alaska one day, sell it the next, take that money and divide it out among the people of the States for education, and then the next day go to the Treasury and take money out raised by taxation and buy Alaska back and on the next day sell it again, and in that way provide a fund for the education of the people of this country. An argument which leads to such an absurdity hardly merits answer. For it is an unquestioned truth that we can not do in this indirect and sinister way what we can not in a direct and honest way.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Texas has given us the sanction of his great name and authority for voting money raised by taxation for the purposes of education. The Senator voted for the Burnside bill of 1880, and that contained a clause donating to education in the States the receipts in the Treasury from the Patent Office. Those receipts are taxes; they are called fees; but they were not fees limited and paid to the officers who rendered the service. They never got them at all. The officers were paid by the United States directly out of the Treasury, and those fees were paid directly into the Treasury by the persons upon whom they were imposed. Now let us see if money thus raised comes within the definition of taxation given by all the authorities. Judge Story, whom the Senator compliments for his great learning, and very justly, too, defines taxation to be this:

> In a general sense all contributions imposed by the Government upon individuals for the service of the State are called taxes, by whatever name they may be known, whether by the name of tribute, tithe, tallage, impost, duty, gabel, custom, subsidy, aid, supply, excise, or other name.

In order to be a tax it only has to be a contribution to the public Treasury imposed by public authority. The fees of the Patent Office were a contribution required and imposed by the law of the United States, and they were paid into the Treasury of the United States. Tucker in his Appendix to Blackstone's Commentaries gives the same definition as Judge Story. Mr. Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, gives substantially the same definition. Webster's Dictionary gives also substantially the same definition. So, sir, every dollar that goes into the Treasury that results from a contribution imposed by law upon the citizen comes from the power of taxation, and is money raised by taxation. I will read from more authorities on that subject, because I do not want to have that misunderstood. Tax is a general name, it is a nomen generalissimum. It includes all species of taxation, and the Supreme Court of the United States in 1796 said:

> The term duty—

Used in this taxing article—

> is the most comprehensive next to the generical term tax; and practically in Great Britain (whence we take our general ideas of taxes, duties, imposts, excises, customs, &c.) embraces taxes on stamps, tolls for passage, &c., and is not confined to taxes on importation only. (3 Dallas, 175.)

Blackstone, in his Commentaries, has also given us an instance of what duties are, which I will read. Speaking of the means of revenue that the kings of Great Britain have, Blackstone, on page 321 of his first book, says:

> Another very considerable branch of the revenue is levied with greater cheerfulness, as, instead of being a burden, it is a manifest advantage to the public. I mean the post-office, or duty for the carriage of letters.

A duty is a tax, and hence charges made by the Post-Office are taxes.

The Senator may say that it is not a tax, but a charge only for doing work. I would answer him in two ways. In the first place, according to Blackstone and all the commentators, it being a contribution for the public Treasury, imposed by public authority, he is wrong. Then I would answer him on the fact, it is not a charge as compensation for labor; it can not be. If that were so the charges upon carrying letters ought to be proportioned to the work done. There would be no propriety in making the same charge for carrying a letter from the northeast corner of Maine to the southwest corner of Texas or to Alaska that you make for carrying it ten miles. So, sir, when Texas needed this aid, when the Senator from Texas wanted this aid for common schools of his State, there was no objection found to having not only the proceeds of the public lands, but also the proceeds of taxes—money raised by taxation—applied to education. It was all right in 1880 to vote money raised by taxation to purposes of education, but is all wrong now, absolutely unconstitutional, destructive of the powers of the States.

Mr. President, I have a good deal more to say, but I will not detain the Senate much longer. I have already detained it too long; but it is a matter in which I feel a great interest. It is a matter in which my constituents feel a great interest. I have endeavored to follow the Senator from Texas and to show that he is in error and to maintain the constitutional power of Congress over the subject. There is only one other position of the Senator to which I will allude, and that is that Congress can not make a gift to a State.

Mr. President, Texas was admitted into the Union in 1845 under a resolution which exempted the United States from any responsibility for her debts. The original proposal made before that contained that as one of the specifications. After that time Congress paid Texas $10,000,000 for an adjustment of the line between Texas and New Mexico. Five million dollars of that was reserved in the Treasury for the creditors of Texas who had a pledge of the customs of that State before her annexation. That was all right. But in 1855 there was another act passed, not only paying the $5,000,000 which had then been reserved out of the purchase money for the line between Texas and New Mexico, but an additional sum of $2,750,000 was given for the purpose of paying the debts of Texas. There was no obligation to pay, and there being no obligation on the part of the Government, it was not the payment of a debt. Being not the payment of a debt or the discharge of an obligation, it was a pure voluntary gift.

But the Senator says that the fact that the State must accept the gift shows that Congress has no power to make it, and yet in that very act the consent of Texas was required; she gave it, and the gift was made. It seems to me sometimes that our forefathers, Washington and others, when they met in national convention to form a constitution for the thirteen States which they were supposed to represent, must have forgotten their duty and ignored the States of the American Union then existing; but reversing the action of the Senator from Texas, he living in the past and discarding the present, they, equally discarding the present but with prophetic ken looking alone to the future, discovered that in a province of Spain adjoining our borders was a magnificent territory then not inhabited but which in the future would become inhabited by a great and enterprising people, and that these people would in time be admitted into the Federal Union; and so dazzled were they by the prospects of this magnificent country being a part of the Union and at the extension of our institutions over this great, imperial, and magnificent State, that they made no provision for the other States, but made a constitution for Texas, and for Texas alone.

So we see in 1880 and in 1876, when land and the proceeds of land, and when taxes the proceeds of patents, were to be given, Texas then through her Senators said "We need it." I wish I had time to read, for I have it here before me, the magnificent and splendid presentation then made of the wants and needs of the Southern people for aid in education, arising, as was said, in a large measure from the large infusion of Africans into their citizenship. Texas was included. Texas then wanted help. Texas did not pretend to be over and above or better off than the balance of her Southern sisters. I refer to the splendid speech of the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY]. I wish I had time to read it; I had marked it to read, but I can not detain the Senate, though I call the attention of Senators to it. It was made in favor of the passage of both those bills—one in 1876 and another in 1880. Then the Constitution was big enough and broad enough to make this grant. Now Texas, we are informed by the same Senator, is able to take care of her own; and he informed us also that he is to act for Texas, that he can not know or consider the condition of Mississippi or any other Southern State; that he stands here as the representative of Texas, and as Texas does not need this he will not have it. And his colleague comes along and helps him in this by proving that we can not do it, by proving that what they did in 1880, when Texas needed the aid, was all constitutional and right, but to-day is all unconstitutional and wrong!

Sir, I am not justified in saying, in view of these historical facts, that the Constitution seems to have been made exclusively by our forefathers for the benefit of the State of Texas, a glorious State, a great State, a State that I will not say I voted to admit into the Union because I was not old enough then to vote, but I did all I could in that way. I am proud of her, and I think we are well justified in her admission. I admire the prescience of our forefathers. Instead of making a government for the old thirteen States they seem to have devoted themselves exclusively to the benefit of Texas, giving the Constitution automatic power of expansion and contraction. When Texas wants money, the proceeds of the public lands, the proceeds of taxes, as I have shown that the Patent Office fees are taxes, the Constitution then stretches itself out enough to give the power. When our friends, by a good fortune which I do not envy and do not grudge, have outstripped in their growth the other States, when thousands of immigrants from beyond the seas and also from the older States of the South are flocking into her borders, making her still richer and still greater, until she has got into a condition where she does not need the aid that this bill gives, then there is no power to act!

Mr. President, I apologize for having detained the Senate so long. I might say more, but I have already taken too much time. I shall only say in conclusion that the sad consequences which the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] predicted may follow from this bill in the way of Federal usurpation I can not admit. I have no right to anticipate such a result from the action of Senators on the other side; but I will say that if Southern Senators refuse so gracious an offering made by the North as is contained in this bill, giving them and their people the administration and government of this fund; if there is a belief, as the Senator from Texas seems to assume there is, that Congress may interpose directly in the education of the people of the South—I say if we refuse this, it will be but an invitation to those who entertain that opinion and who think we have failed in our duty to put in exercise the power which they believe to exist. There is where I believe the danger comes from. But however that may be, I see in the South millions of unlettered children; I see in the South, wasted and desolated by war, an inability to educate them; I see on the part of these illiterate children of both races and of their parents an anxiety that they be educated; I see on the part of the property classes of the South a willingness to help them; but with all this desire, with all this willingness there is in many of the States, my own among them, an inability to meet the demand, and I gladly, in behalf of the suffering population of the State of Mississippi and of the other Southern States, give my vote in support of this measure.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi announced when he arose that it was only for the purpose of fortifying arguments made when he addressed the Senate before. The Senator has occupied now within eight minutes of three hours. I draw the conclusion that the Senator holds the opinion that his argument which he has been rebuilding had been very badly damaged, judging from the length of time he has taken in repairing it.

So far as the argument of the Senator is concerned in reply to that made by myself, my argument is printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; the Senator's will be printed to-morrow morning in the RECORD; and whoever feels curious to examine them can determine the merits of the pending bill so far as they are exhibited by the discussion.

I have this to say, however, that upon an examination of the Senator's argument it will be found that he has utterly failed to meet any substantial point that I made. I do not mean to say that he has evaded or that he has dodged the real points and issues presented in my remarks and arising out of the bill. I simply mean to say that he has not met them.

With one more remark, Mr. President, I shall have nothing further to say, being entirely content to leave the discussion where it now stands. The Senator has placed a construction on this bill peculiarly his own, one given to it, if I may judge by the expression in this debate, by very few on this side, and so far as I believe universally repudiated on the other side of this Chamber by those who support the bill, to wit, that the appropriation can be accepted by the States without implying a right on the part of the National Government to intervene in the management or administration of the schools. I simply desire to suggest to the Senator that however conscientious he may be, and I know is in his views and opinions, as to the action proposed by the bill, whatever may be the strength of his faith in their correctness, yet considering not only the probability but the certainty that a large majority of those who will vote with him for the bill hold opinions exactly the reverse of his on the vital point indicated, his support and advocacy of the measure under these circumstances, although he intends otherwise, in substance and effect aids and assists in bringing about the results he so much deprecates as fully as if he intended them. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President——

Mr. VAN WYCK. May I ask the Senator from Ohio to yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. PENDLETON. I will, retaining the floor.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio, being entitled to the floor, yields to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, I desire this opportunity only to make a few suggestions, not in the nature of a speech on this matter, but more particularly to obtain information as to some of the details of the bill. We have now had two solid weeks and more of speeches as to general principles and as to the Constitution, so that I think by this time we fully understand that instrument; but it would seem from the nature of the discussion thus far that one great feature of this bill, after all, is not to be attained, and that is the peace-offering character of it. It was supposed that this bill appropriating over $100,000,000 would be received as a peace offering from one side to the other, but evidently it is not received in that spirit. Therefore that feature of the bill, I take it, will have to be eliminated.

Then it comes down to the proposition that this money is to be appropriated purely for education, the education of the illiterate children in the South and not only in the South but in the North also; and here it would seem necessary that a little attention should be paid to details, because if we appropriate as we propose over $100,000,000 and spend week after week in discussing the great question of its constitutionality and leave the details of the measure without any sort of consideration, we shall be precisely in the situation that the Senator from Kansas a few days ago said we should be, that after a year or two had advanced dissatisfaction would grow up as to the expenditure of this money, complaints would be made to Congress, and resolutions for committees of investigation would necessarily have to be adopted so as to see whether this money was being spent as the originators of the measure intended.

I have been listening in order to ascertain the situation of affairs now in the States where it is claimed that the most illiteracy prevails and what guarantee there is as to the proper application of this fund. A long time ago I asked my friend from New Hampshire as to the guarantee in another matter. I asked him what guarantee had been given for the exercise of the elective franchise in certain States of this Union, when assurance on that point would strengthen the proposition. My friend very frankly said that there was no such guarantee, that the franchise was not exercised as was intended by the Congress and by the nation which made that gift. The Republic made that as a gift to the Southern States, because it presented them with a large number of additional Representatives on the floor of Congress, and therefore it was a gift of great value to them; and yet that gift of the elective franchise has not been bestowed and provided for as those who originated it intended.

Now this gift comes as I understand in the same way—$105,000,000 in money to be expended in ten years. Therefore it is that I have been listening to find out the status of the South; I have examined the statistics to learn just how many school-houses there were in the Southern States, because we must speak of the Southern States when we speak of the education of illiterate colored children. I have been striving for two weeks while this discussion has been going on to hear some suggestion as to whether, and to what extent, school buildings were provided in the States where illiterate colored children live, especially in those portions of the States that are sparsely settled, the agricultural, the working portions. I desired to know that, because I think the laws of those States provide that the colored children and the white children shall not be educated in the same school, in the same building. Now I would ask my friend from New Hampshire, who has given so much time and attention to this matter, if there are any statistics anywhere which show the number of schools in the Southern States for the education of colored children.

Mr. BLAIR. There is a table in the speech which I had the honor of making some time ago.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Does the table state that?

Mr. BLAIR. It does; it gives the statistics of the last five years.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I thought I had read all the Senator's speech and all the statistics on the subject.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will proceed with his remarks, I will find the table for him.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I have been looking for it anxiously for the last two weeks, for this reason: The tenth section of this bill provides that none of this fund shall be used for constructing buildings. I offered two amendments some time ago, but no progress on the amendments will be reached during this session apparently, and therefore I desire to get the information now.

Mr. BLAIR. Table 8, on page 2198 of the RECORD of the 19th of March, "Colored schools and colored-school enrollment in the Southern States for five years, from 1877 to 1881, both dates inclusive [prepared by the United States Bureau of Education]," shows that the number of colored public schools in 1877 was 10,792; in 1878, 14,247; in 1879, 14,341; in 1880, 16,669; in 1881, 17,248; and the enrollment of colored children has increased gradually from 571,506 in 1877 to 802,372 in 1881. The normal schools for secondary instruction, universities, and colleges, schools of theology, schools of law, schools of medicine, schools for the blind and deaf mutes, are all contained in the same table relating wholly to colored students, and of course the Senator will hardly care to have me read the details.

Mr. VAN WYCK. No; that is not necessary.

Mr. BLAIR. In regard to the number of school-houses, there is always a school-house where there is a school. In other parts of the collection of statistics there are general data as to the number of school-houses. If that information is not in this table it is in a report which I had the honor to submit.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I should like to know as to the number of school-houses. What is the area covered by the table the Senator read?

Mr. BLAIR. The colored children in the Southern States.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Has the Senator any information as to the number of school-houses for colored children?

Mr. BLAIR. I say that it is fair to assume that there is a school-house where there is a school, and the number of these schools by the latest returns we have of an official character is 17,248.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I probably omitted to look at that table in reading the Senator's remarks. What is the comparison between the number of schools for colored children and for whites?

Mr. BLAIR. That aggregate will be found in the table.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Has the Senator any general idea as to the proportion?

Mr. BLAIR. I can not state the proportion now.

Mr. VAN WYCK. That was the fact I desired to know.

Mr. BLAIR. It is over a third, and very nearly one-half, I think.

Mr. VAN WYCK. A third in these States. There are one-third as many schools for the education of colored children as for the education of white children; and yet in these States or in some of them the illiterate colored children exceed the illiterate whites. Therefore you start with a majority of children needing education with a minority of the schools. That is the point I desired to get at.

This bill prevents the expenditure of any of this money for building school-houses, and why? You pass this bill, and in one year when complaint is made that this money is not equitably distributed so that the colored children may reap its benefits, you will be answered then by the fact that your very bill prevents it; your very bill prevents an equality of education among the illiterates in the South, because the bill itself says that none of this money shall be used for the construction of buildings.

Mr. BLAIR. It ought to be stated in that connection that the superintendents of education for the Southern States, quite a number of them and the best-informed educators having local knowledge, say they will find buildings, though they may not happen to be constructed as school-houses, specifically for that purpose, to hold their schools until they can construct them. If they can obtain money to pay teachers and can get books, they will establish schools and build houses of a permanent character hereafter. There are innumerable buildings of a public character, and many of the mansions of the South, the plantation houses all through the South that are unoccupied, and yet on the whole suitable buildings which may be occupied for schools.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator permit me.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Certainly.

Mr. CALL. Do I understand the Senator from Nebraska to say that the statistics presented here exhibit the disproportion of one-third of the colored children to two-thirds of white children?

Mr. VAN WYCK. No; that was in regard to school-houses, buildings.

Mr. CALL. I desire to say that the school fund is equally distributed in my own State and everywhere else in the South as far as I know.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The proportion stated is the opinion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. I will say a word further to the Senator from Nebraska. His point is that there is no way to spend the first year's money because there is nowhere to hold the schools the first year. I have replied to that and in a way that is satisfactory to those who are interested in the education of the Southern children. But there is an amendment offered here to which I personally will give very hearty support, the amendment of the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] looking to the immediate stimulation at least of the construction of permanent and suitable school-houses. There is no doubt, I think, that that is a deficiency in the bill. I would have been very glad to have included originally a provision in it looking to the construction of school-houses, but it seemed to be thought by the Southern people that if they could only get money to pay teachers, in some way they would contrive to get on temporarily until school-houses could be built. It is for that among other reasons that I felt a very strong opposition to any amendment of the bill which looks to the fettering of the local power in the expenditure of the fund for the construction of school-houses.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Since the Senator is satisfied that the bill needs amendment in that respect, I need dwell no more on that point. He agrees with me that that section should be stricken out and that provision should be made for building school-houses. So he sees the force of the fact that if we do not so provide, in a year or so we shall be answered by the statement that the bill prevented it.

I desire, because we are on details now, to refer to the next section, which I should like to call the Senator's attention to, as it refers to the expenditures of this money, and of course that is the important thing. The section provides:

SEC. 11. That the moneys distributed under the provisions of this act shall be used in the school districts of the several States and Territories in such way as to provide, as near as may be, for the equalization of school privileges to all the children of the school age prescribed by the law of the State or Territory wherein the expenditure shall be made, thereby giving to each child an opportunity for common-school and, so far as may be, of industrial education; and to this end existing public schools, not sectarian in character, may be aided, and new ones may be established, as may be deemed best in the several localities.

I wish to know the intention of this language, "not sectarian in character." I have an amendment to strike that out, but that will evidently not be reached this session on account of the great constitutional question that is being discussed.

Mr. BLAIR. To relieve the Senator I suggest that he move to amend that section by striking out all after the semicolon at the end of the word "education," in the eighth line.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I was only anxious to know why this clause crept into the bill, the expression "public schools not sectarian in character."

Mr. BLAIR. I will then explain to the Senator, although saying that to save time I shall be perfectly willing that his amendment be adopted provided it takes out the entire section after the semicolon, in line 8. There are many public schools in this country which receive assistance from public funds which are sectarian in character. Many of the statesmen of this country have thought that in no event should public money derived by universal taxation be expended for the promotion, however indirectly, of the interests of any one denomination; and we have as the Republican party, I think, proposed at one time an amendment to the Constitution that none of the common-school money of the country should be expended for sectarian purposes.

It seemed to me in drafting the bill, and I still look at it in that light, that in perhaps New Orleans and other cities of the South, and in those cities of the North where there is assistance furnished to Catholic schools, and they are the only means of instruction of a large mass of the school population, there would be a very natural inclination to appropriate a part of this money to the support of those sectarian schools; and so as to schools of the Episcopalian and other denominations which maintain public schools, substantially public in their nature; and unless there was an inhibition in the bill they might come to be partially sustained by appropriations from the Treasury of the United States if this bill should become a law.

Therefore it was that this clause was added to the section; but it having been objected to by the Senator, and as I really think that other provisions in the bill provide explicitly in such a way that no money can go to the support of sectarian schools, I am perfectly willing that this clause shall be stricken out of section 11.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Do I understand the Senator to say that there are public schools, common schools—because I understand public schools to be common schools——

Mr. BLAIR. I do not, necessarily.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Are there any common schools in any State of this Union that are at all sectarian?

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know that I feel like occupying the session by taking time to answer that question, because the term "common schools" is not used in the particular section which is being now discussed; the term is "public schools," and I have given to the Senator my explanation.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Public schools are those that are sustained out of the public Treasury, I understand, by a tax upon the people or by the proceeds of public lands, or by whatever fund the public may supply. Can the Senator call our attention to any public schools in any State that are at all sectarian in character?

Mr. BLAIR. Is it of consequence to the Senator if he can have his amendment adopted without the consumption of further time? I have given my reasons, and if it was necessary to take the time I could sustain them.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Now we are getting on very well. We are getting the details of the bill in reasonable shape. The Senator desires, or evidently will consent, to my amendment; but I wondered how a provision like that as to "public schools not sectarian in character" could creep into this bill from this Committee on Education and Labor. Some days ago I proposed an amendment to strike out the words "not sectarian in character." At the present rate of progress the amendment will probably be not reached this session, and hence I desired the Senator in charge of this bill to explain just what was meant by the words I wish to have stricken out.

There are no public schools of a sectarian character. Then why these words as a gratuitous thrust against a sect which has done more for education than any other? The world is indebted to the Catholic Church from the time of the Dark Ages, when she preserved the literature of the centuries preceding, and in our earlier history, when she established missions and schools among the Indians, until now she is aiding to educate the colored man, and gathers her own children into parochial schools.

A religion whose creed we may not indorse and whose faith we may not believe is preferable to infidelity hid under the mask of "liberal Christianity." To-day nothing is so intolerant as this boasted liberalism, which, under the pretense of blotting out sects, has united with sectarianism in the attempt to drive the Bible from the common schools, and is ever trying to weaken that sentiment which steadies the progress of reform in the State, which sanctions the pure and good in society, tending to make liberty more enduring.

I have said this much in regard to these words which were thrust into this bill evidently without any purpose or any object. I could not believe, and did not, and do not now, that it was in deference to the system of infidelity which I have characterized in these few words, and I rejoice that gentlemen advocating this bill are willing that the clause should be stricken from it.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAIR. I do not object to the Senator's amendment. I understand the purpose of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. PENDLETON. I do.

Mr. BLAIR. Would it have suited him better to have omitted the clause and have provided that this aid should be given to public schools which are sectarian in character?

Mr. VAN WYCK. No, sir; there was no occasion that there should be anything in regard to "sectarian" in the bill; but the Senator has spoken of the Catholic Church, and if because Catholics choose to educate their own children in some belief rather than that they should be brought up and taught infidelity, this clause was meant as a thrust at them, then I desired to characterize it as I have.

Mr. BLAIR. There was no such purpose, and the Senator can not expect success in the use of any language that would have a tendency to impute to me the purpose of an insult to the Catholic Church. Eight millions of our fellow-citizens are within the pale of the Catholic Church to-day, and I respect her for what she has done for mankind. I never rejoice more than I do when she extends her borders, save when the Protestant forms of religion, in which I more especially believe, go forth to conquer the world and to give salvation to mankind. These words had no peculiar reference to the Catholic Church. All over the South are schools under the bounties of other denominations, and their schools are substantially public—public to the colored children in many instances; public to white children of the South who get education in no other way. But it did seem to me proper when we are taxing all denominations and people of no denomination for the money which is to be expended for the removal of the illiteracy of the United States at large, that we should make provision that if any of this money were appropriated to the maintenance of what are not properly common schools, but which are yet properly public schools—public substantially in their character—none of it should be appropriated for the maintenance of denominational or sectarian schools. So far as the Catholic Church is concerned, I respect it quite as much as I imagine does my friend from Nebraska.

Mr. VOORHEES rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. PENDLETON. I do.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope that the Senator will withhold that motion.

Mr. VOORHEES. I make it subject to the wish of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. PENDLETON. What is the object of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BLAIR. As I gave notice last night, I desire to ask the Senate to remain in session in order to dispose of the bill, and under no circumstances to adjourn at this early hour.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is utterly impossible from my knowledge of what is to come. I insist upon my motion.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not, unless for formal business.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I ask the Senator from Indiana to withdraw the motion to adjourn that I may submit a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business and then adjourn.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope that neither motion will prevail. We may as well test the matter on a motion to adjourn.

Mr. VOORHEES. I insist on my motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question, and declared that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I call for a division.

Mr. BLAIR. The yeas and nays may as well be taken. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary called the roll.

Mr. COCKRELL (after having voted in the affirmative). The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] was compelled to be absent from the Chamber for a few minutes, and I paired with him. I presume that he would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know; I presume so.

Mr. COCKRELL. I withdraw my vote in consequence of my pair

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote is withdrawn.

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—18.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. PENDLETON. I will.

Mr. HARRIS. I understand that the Senator from Ohio prefers to proceed with his remarks in the morning rather than proceed to-night. It is now half after 5 o'clock. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. VAN WYCK (when Mr. MANDERSON's name was called). I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. MANDERSON] is paired on the educational bill with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 29, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—29.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 2, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Right Rev. W. S. PERRY, D.D., LL. D., bishop of Iowa.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday was read and approved.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 210) requiring the Secretary of War to furnish copies of certain muster-rolls to the governor of the State of Ohio; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CLEMENTS, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence on account of sickness.

ADDITIONAL FOLDERS.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask by unanimous consent to introduce for reference to the Committee on Accounts the following resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized to employ twelve additional laborers in the House folding-room for the purpose of folding speeches, to be paid out of the contigent fund of the House, at the rate of $720 per annum while employed: Provided, That the said twelve additional employés shall be dropped from the roll of the Doorkeeper at a period not more than one month after the expiration of the present session.

Mr. COX, of New York. That is the usual resolution.

There was no objection, and the resolution was received and referred to the Committee on Accounts.

TESTIMONY BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I now send to the desk. I am satisfied that there will be no objection made to it.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of each member of the House one copy of the hearings had before and testimony taken by the Committee on Ways and Means on what is known as the "Morrison tariff bill."

Mr. ANDERSON. This is already in print, I will say.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MILLS. Let it be referred.

Mr. ANDERSON. Then I ask its reference to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

NORTHERN PACIFIC LAND GRANTS.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to offer a memorial for reference.

The SPEAKER. The title of the memorial will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Memorial of the bondholders of the Northern Pacific Railroad praying to be heard before the Committee on the Public Lands on the bill declaring the forfeiture of the lands granted, and asking Congress to protect their interests.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the memorial will be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REED. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill which I send to the desk, and put the same upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1212) to extend the duration of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, and for other purposes.

Mr. RANDALL, Mr. HOLMAN, and others demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded is equivalent to an objection.

The regular order is the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

Mr. ELLIS. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

The SPEAKER. That requires a two-thirds vote.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills, my object being to call up for consideration the bill making appropriations for the Indian service for the next fiscal year.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. WELLBORN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills. The Clerk will report the title of the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, if the House will give me its attention for a few moments I will endeavor to give such an explanation of the bill as I hope will rob it of m[illegible] friction and prevent much useless debate.

The bill under consideration is divided into seven distinct heads. Under the first will be found the appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian service. The estimates under this first head for the next fiscal year, as submitted by the Department, amount to $313,300.

The bill recommends the appropriation of $198,900, or less than the estimates by $114,400, and $1,500 in excess of the appropriation for the current year. Under this head, sir, are made appropriations for the salaries of Indian agents, regular and special, of interpreters, inspectors, school superintendents, and their incidental and traveling expenses. The great difference between the estimates submitted by the Department and the amount recommended by the bill is accounted for principally in this way: In nearly every case the Department has estimated for an increase of the salaries of Indian agents. In my judgment, sir, careful attention should be paid to the question of the salaries of the Indian agents. We had not the time, nor had we the information, to enable us to determine how or in what manner the increase of salaries should be made. My judgment is that if the Department expects to command the services of Indian agents of character, of reputation, of undoubted honesty, the Government will ultimately be obliged to increase their salaries. In the main the salaries provided for by this bill are exactly those of the last year. In one or two instances there is a slight decrease. In the case of the Indian agent at the Navajo agency there has been an increase of $500, especially on the recommendation of the Department, and which seemed to be absolutely necessary to the committee. His being in charge of 17,000 Indians, scattered over a reservation one hundred miles square, encountering great difficulties in their management, requiring great judgment and an immense amount of industry and activity, we deemed it due to him that the salary should be restored to $2,000, which it originally was when he went there and took charge of the agency.

Under the second head will be found the appropriations for the fulfilling of treaties with Indian tribes. Some of the amounts fixed by treaty are absolute, and in such cases the full amount has been appropriated. In other treaties the stipulations in regard to the support are flexible, and the appropriations have been decreased.

I would call the attention of the House here to the policy, which in my judgment is a wise policy, which has been inaugurated by the Government in regard to the support of the Indians, the idea being to gradually withdraw their support so as to encourage them to industry, to make them feel that eventually this support must cease entirely, and then upon their own exertions will depend their existence and their progress.

The estimates under this head called for $3,681,826.31; while the amount appropriated for the current year was $2,671,085.91; and the amount recommended in the bill is $2,551,703.10, or less than the appropriations for the current year by $119,382.81, and less by $1,130,-123.21 than the estimates.

The decrease from the bill for last year is found in the declared policy of the Government to which I have just made reference. That is, gradually making the Indian tribes self-supporting. And in order to do this we must gradually withdraw their support, teaching them this support must decrease and thus stimulating them to habits of industry and labor, and making them independent. The vast difference of $1,130,-123.21 between the estimates and the amount recommended by the bill is accounted for by the fact that the estimates are drawn upon the basis of all that could possibly be due to the Indians under the treaties. For instance, the sixth article of our treaty with the Navajo tribe of date June 1, 1868, provides that the United States shall furnish a school-house and a teacher for every thirty Indian children who could be induced to attend school. The Department estimates for a school-house and teacher for every thirty of these children of that tribe and asks for the sum of $189,100; while the fact is that there are but two schools, with an attendance of less than one hundred pupils. The bill gives under that item $10,000. In allowing this sum we were guided by the fact that the process of education must be gradual. We believe that $10,000 would organize three new schools and support them, and that if the Indians showed a disposition to avail themselves of educational advantages the schools could be gradually increased in numbers year by year. I give this single illustration as explanatory of the reasons which exist for the great difference between the estimates of the Department and the amount recommended by the bill.

There is one of these treaties which calls for special attention in our legislation. I refer now especially to the treaty with the Sioux tribe; and in this connection I might mention the treaty with the confederated bands of Utes. I regard both of these treaties as ill-advised, prejudicial to the interests of the Government, and also prejudicial to the interests of the Indian, because provision is made in them that is in fact eternal for the support of those Indians. We are obliged absolutely to support every man, woman, and child of those two tribes as long as time lasts.

In my judgment, sir, this is wrong. In my judgment, if we thus invite the Indian to idleness and vagrancy he will accept the invitation. I believe that this treaty should be modified so as to make the amount of their support gradually decrease from year to year, letting them know in the course of time it will cease, that they may be stimulated to habits of industry.

Under the head of "miscellaneous supports" are to be found appropriations for the support, care, education, and civilization of various Indians amounting to $1,117,000, which is $471,300 less than the estimate, and $64,000 less than the appropriation for the current year.

Nearly all the items under this head have been decreased under the policy to which I have had reference with the view of rendering these Indians self-sustaining. A few of the items have been increased because of insufficiency of appropriation for the current year. The bill for the current year was most carefully and ably drawn by my friend and colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN]; but estimating for certain Indian tribes of Montana and the Haulapais Indians, he did not take into consideration the fact that the game had entirely disappeared from those reservations, and he did not foresee that if drought and frost should occur it would ruin the crops. This could not be foreseen, and therefore no human foresight could have provided against this deficiency.

In regard to the items for these Indians, those facts have been taken into consideration and the amounts have been increased.

Under the fourth head will be found the appropriations for the support of the schools. Under this head provision is made for the support of established Indian schools. The estimate was $1,600,300. The bill recommends $785,000, which is $815,220 less than the estimates, but is in excess of the appropriations for the current year by $134,880.

The problem of Indian education, in my judgment, is solved in favor of the Indian. The reports from all the schools show the most commendable degree of progress on the part of Indian pupils both as to mental development and a disposition toward industry. Instances almost pathetic in their details are given of the eagerness of the Indian for instruction. The policy recently adopted of extending the benefits of education and industrial training to Indian girls as well as boys is attended with the most gratifying success. The bill under consideration aims to develop the head and the heart of the Indian and to train his hands to useful labor, and not to sustain him in idleness. I am profoundly convinced that this is the true policy.

Since I have been engaged in the preparation of this bill I have seen more than twenty men, the representatives of various tribes, who were educated, robed in the habiliments of civilization, well-mannered, and perfectly capable of taking care of themselves in the arena of life.

Fifth. Under the head of general, incidental, and miscellaneous expenses will be found provisions for the pay of Indian police, for expenses of telegraphing, for purchasing and transporting supplies for the support of Indian industrial schools, and for the establishment of other schools. The estimates for this purpose amount to $1,127,913, while the appropriations for the current year amount to $565,800. The amount for this purpose recommended in this bill is $599,800, or $528,113 below the estimates, and $34,000 below the amount appropriated for the current year. The increase over the appropriations for the current year is owing to augmented recommendations for educational purposes in the establishment of industrial schools.

That the amount recommended by the bill for this purpose is nearly $600,000 below the estimates is attributable to the fact that large estimates have been made for certain tribes that appear to be doing well enough now, and there are included also in the estimates certain agreements with certain tribes which are too vague and indefinite to form the basis of any considerable expenditure.

Sixth. Under the head of interest of trust funds and stocks, the recommendations of the bill are exactly in accordance with the estimates. They are fixed by law, and are precisely the same as the appropriations for the current fiscal year. The estimates for this purpose amount to $95,170, and the recommendation of the bill is for the same amount.

The total amount estimated by the Department for this service is $8,466,809.91. The appropriations for the current year were $5,360,655.91. The total amount recommended by this bill is $5,347,653.10, which is $3,119,156.81 less than the estimates, and $13,002.81 less than the appropriations for the current fiscal year. If we deduct from this bill the item of $20,000 for the starving Hualapais Indians, which is a deficiency, and urgent in its character, the appropriations contained in the bill are really $33,002.81 less than the appropriations for the current fiscal year.

I think it proper now to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to some provisions of general legislation contained in this bill. I may say here that I am opposed in principle to general legislation on appropriation bills. But there were some items that seemed to me so apposite and so germane to this bill and so urgent in their character that I thought it proper to ask the Committee on Appropriations to place them on the bill. The committee unanimously agreed with me.

One of the provisions, based upon the most urgent recommendation of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, aims at preventing and utterly breaking up the whisky traffic among the Indians. The great curse of the Indian tribes, the great difficulty in the way of the civilizing influences with which we seek to guide these people aright, is the whisky traffic as pointed out by report after report of the Indian agents. The Department asked for $5,000 for the purpose of detecting, prosecuting, and punishing men who surreptitiously sell liquor to the Indians. The committee have framed such a provision and have proposed an amendment to two of the sections of the Revised Statutes.

By sections 2139 and 2140 of the Revised Statutes, I think, it is made a sufficient defense to any prosecution of any person for selling liquor to the Indians that it was done by authority of the War Department. Those two sections have been amended so as to take away that defense.

An amendment which will probably be offered by my friend from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS], and to which I have no objection, and which I think is right, perfectly guards officers and soldiers of the United States Army in regard to having and keeping liquors for their own use at forts and military posts within Indian reservations. I call upon the House to sustain the committee in this item of general legislation. If they will peruse the reports of the Indian agents they will find that liquor-selling to the Indians is the curse of the Indian. Naturally a savage, he is made more so when inflamed by liquor; and all the efforts made to educate him and civilize him, to bring him to the light in which we walk, are constantly thwarted, and he is driven back from the course in which we seek to lead him. It behooves us as intelligent, humane, and enlightened men, caring for these people, peculiarly and particularly the wards of the Government, to take away from them this temptation.

Another item of general legislation will be found in the last section of this bill. It requires all Indian agents every year to make a complete census of the Indians at their agencies, or upon the reservations under their charge; the number of males above 18 years of age; the number of females above 14 years of age; the number of school children between the ages of 6 and 16 years; the number of school-houses at each agency; the number of schools in operation, and the attendance at each, and the names of teachers employed, and the salaries paid such teachers.

This is absolutely necessary in order to give future committees on appropriations and future Congresses intelligent facts by which to guide their action. We have to make appropriations for the school children pro rata, and if we do not know the number of them we can not know what amount to appropriate.

Under certain stipulations in certain treaties we are obliged to give girls above the age of 14 years so much clothing and boys above the age of 18 so much clothing. And unless we know the number of Indians above those ages, or within those ages, it is impossible for us to legislate intelligently. We should therefore have this information.

In the preparation of this bill I have been struck with three facts. One is that the Indian is wholly without the courts. I believe that the benefits of the courts should be extended to him. I believe that he should have the means to coerce men to keep their contracts with him, men or corporations. I believe that the courts should be seized of jurisdiction of offenses committed by the white man against the Indian and also by an Indian against an Indian.

I believe if the paternal care of the Government was extended over him and he could be made to feel that he was protected by the laws of the United States it would develop in him a loyalty and a tendency toward civilization. I believe it would tend to make him feel that the United States did have care for him and that he was more and more a man. But the committee had not time to consider a question of such magnitude and which should employ the very best qualities of statesmanship in its consideration.

Another thing, Mr. Chairman; I believe that we should soon take steps toward making these people citizens. I believe the door of citizenship should be opened to them. I believe that if we could make them citizens, if we could interest them in the Government—of course this must be a gradual process, it can not be done all at once, but if, as they attain certain degrees of intelligence, certain degrees of education, a certain measure of independence and self-support, they should be invested with citizenship—if this can be done, attachment to the Government, attachment to the flag, attachment to the traditions of the country would come, and we would find it would make of them good citizens.

Mr. LONG. And the barbaric element would go?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir; as the gentleman from Massachusetts remarks.

the barbaric element would go, and I believe we should take this step very soon. These people now feel that they are ostracized, that they are outside, that the Government has no care for them except to keep them from the warpath. They feel no interest in the Government whatever. And I do not wonder at it after the hundred years of dishonor which has characterized the actions of the Government toward them. Citizenship, the courts, and the schools—these are the agencies which are to solve the Indian problem, and solve it in the interest of humanity and of Christianity.

Mr. Chairman, in walking toward the Senate did you ever pause in that corridor beneath the great Dome where art has given to immortality some of the most striking scenes in American history and look at the figures which appear in bas-relief over the four doors which lead to the Rotunda? If you turn to the eastern door, there are figures representing the Indian meeting the Puritan Fathers, as their shallops scraped on the rocks of the New England shore, with ears of corn in his hand. If you turn to the northern door, another group illustrates the Indian striking hands with William Penn and entering into a treaty of amity and friendship. If you turn to the western door, another group illustrates the oft-told story of the Indian maiden shielding with her form and hands and supplications the white man from the uplifted blow of the war-club.

If you turn to the southern door, there is the reward of the Indian. The pioneer with one foot on the body of a slain Indian is in deadly conflict with another whose unguarded and exposed side is about to receive the deadly knife. I never pass there without thinking of the conduct of the Government toward the Indian. And I trust, sir, that you and I and all present may live long enough to see another group added. I trust that some genius will give there another group which will represent the atonement of the Government. I would have it the genius of Columbia raising from the dust and ashes of his supersition, of his idleness, of his savagery, this red man. I am no enthusiast. I do not believe in the ideal Indian. I believe in taking him up from all he now is, clothing him in the habiliments of civilization, developing his head, Christianizing his heart, and pointing him on the upward and onward path toward a continued and peaceful prosperity. [Applause.]

And now, Mr. Chairman, I would beg any gentleman who desires any further information about this bill to ask me any question, because probably in that way, this being a business bill, I hope it will be attended with as little debate as possible and put through as rapidly as possible. If any gentleman desires information I will be glad to give it to him.

Mr. KASSON. I should like to ask the gentleman from Louisiana a question touching the eighth section. I desire first, however, with great sincerity, to congratulate the gentleman from Louisiana not only on the clearness of his statement touching the contents of this bill, but more yet on that enlightened appreciation which he seems to me to have shown of the entire Indian problem. I always fear in these Indian appropriation bills that the boast of a member of the Appropriations Committee will be that he has cut down right and left in the mere matter of retaining money in the Treasury of the United States. I renew my congratulations to the gentleman, and the committee which has authorized him in this respect, that he has seemed in this bill to endeavor to provide for the growing demands of the policy which the entire country approves of advancing the civilization of the Indian.

With these remarks by way of expressing my appreciation of what he has said, I now call his attention to the eighth section of the bill, which provides for the case of fraudulent or erroneous accounts. It provides—

> That any disbursing or other officer of the United States or other person who shall knowingly present or cause to be presented, &c.

Referring to the presentation of fraudulent accounts.

Reading further in the same section, beginning with the twentieth line, I find it provided—

> That the officers and persons by and between whom the business is transacted shall be presumed to know the facts in relation to the matter set forth in the voucher, account, or claim.

This clause seems to me to eliminate the usual feature of punitory laws, that an act to be punishable must be willful, must have been committed with a fraudulent or criminal intent. I simply speak of the matter now so that attention may be given to it when we reach that part of the bill.

Mr. ELLIS. This provision is precisely the same as that adopted last year. It seems to me to explain itself fully. But when we reach it in the consideration of the bill by paragraphs I shall be very glad indeed to hear and accept any suggestion from the gentleman; for I know that in statesmanship and wisdom he has hardly a peer in this House.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] a question in regard to the provision beginning at line 993 of the bill, "for care, support, and education of Indian children at industrial, agricultural, mechanical, and other schools." I desire to know whether this appropriation is large enough to provide for the extension of that mode of caring for Indian children.

Mr. ELLIS. We have endeavored to make it so. It is a large increase over the appropriation of last year.

Mr. CHACE. How much was the appropriation last year?

Mr. ELLIS. The general appropriation for 1884 was $75,000, the same as this; but in this bill we have made separate provision for the Lincoln school at Philadelphia, the support of which for the current year is taken from the general appropriation. The appropriation in this bill for the Lincoln school is $33,400, which is substantially an addition of that amount to the appropriation made last year.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I could wish that every appropriation in this bill for day schools for Indians on reservations had been taken out and transferred to a separate item, because it is my deliberate judgment that none of the day schools on reservations are of any earthly use.

Mr. CHACE. Then I understand that the gross increase in the appropriation for the support to schools is about $33,000.

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHACE. What is the decrease of the appropriation for miscellaneous supports?

Mr. ELLIS. The appropriation for miscellaneous supports is $64,000 less in this bill than the appropriation for the same purposes last year.

Mr. CHACE. Is there any provision in this bill—I have not been able to find any—by which the Government will fulfill its agreement with the Dakota Indians under a treaty made with them? I refer to those Indians that were before the House in the emergency appropriation bill in the early part of this session. The gentleman will remember that by the terms of the treaty to which I refer these Indians were to relinquish their reservation to the Government in consideration of which they were to receive $50,000 per annum. I am informed, and I believe correctly informed, that the Government has never ratified that treaty, but has taken the land, has removed the Indians from it, and has only paid them $35,000 a year.

Mr. ELLIS. Does the gentleman refer to the Moses band?

Mr. CHACE. I do.

A MEMBER. And to the Blackfeets.

Mr. ELLIS. This matter was not brought to my attention until after the bill had been framed and passed through the committee.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] refers to the Blackfeet tribe.

Mr. ELLIS. I thought the gentleman referred to the Moses band, with whom the treaty has not been ratified.

Mr. CHACE. Although the treaty has not been ratified, the Government has taken the land, has possessed itself of the property of the Indians, without fulfilling the conditions of the contract.

Mr. ELLIS. That is entirely characteristic of the policy of the Government toward the Indians, a policy which I hope is soon to cease.

Mr. CHACE. I wish to suggest right here that this would be a most excellent time for the committee to change that policy and introduce into this bill an appropriation to pay those Indians the money that is absolutely due them by contract.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The committee in this bill has raised the amount $25,000; the last Congress gave but $45,000.

Mr. CHACE. Why should not the appropriation be raised to the full amount?

Mr. ELLIS. The gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] is referring to the appropriation for the Montana Indians. The item of which the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] speaks is to carry out the treaty which was made between the Secretary of the Interior and Chief Moses in regard to his band. That treaty has never been ratified by the Government of the United States. This matter was not brought to my attention until after this bill had been considered by the committee. It involves the whole question of the ratification of that treaty. My judgment is that the whole matter should be brought before the Senate committee for its action.

Mr. CHACE. I infer from what the gentleman from Louisiana says that if it can be considered in the Senate the Committee on Appropriations will not be indisposed to lend it its favorable action.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If it is to be done at all, Mr. Chairman, why should it not be done here and now. If it is proposed not to be included in this bill, if it is not to be included here at this time, expecting that it will be inserted in the Senate, it seems to me to be a very strange proceeding to omit it from the bill and at the same time give notice in advance to the Senate that if it be inserted by them we will indorse it as soon as it reaches the House again. If it is right and is to be done at all, it ought to be done now.

Mr. CHACE. I agree with the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The gentleman from Louisiana is right that this appropriation involves the ratification of an agreement. The case referred to by the gentleman from Rhode Island is the case of the Blackfeet Indians. Some years ago the Government went on and made a treaty with these Indians by which they were to give them $50,000 a year. That treaty was never ratified, but the Government went on to sell the Indian lands just the same as if the treaty had been ratified. In the mean time Congress commenced to cut down the appropriation from $50,000 a year to $40,000, and then to $35,000 a year, until at last it was cut down as low as $25,000. That was one of the occasions of the deficiency supplied by the committee. I see by this bill the Committee on Appropriations has raised it to $45,000.

Mr. ELLIS. I will say wherever a treaty provided for a fixed sum to be paid the Indians that sum has been appropriated in this bill.

Mr. MAGINNIS. But there was no treaty to guide the committee in this case.

Mr. ELLIS. None.

Mr. MAGINNIS. But the facts are as I have stated them.

Mr. ELLIS. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. That part of the bill to which I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois provides that the rate shall not exceed $167 for each child. I have in my district an industrial training-school for boys, in which many of the children of the poorer classes in Chicago are trained in the industrial arts. They have some twenty or thirty from the wild Indian tribes. I remember when I visited that institution last autumn I was told that this rate of $167 was insufficient. Now, I desire simply to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether that amount has simply been taken from last year's figures, or whether the Committee on Appropriations have considered the question whether it can not be raised to the advantage of the Indians without substantial loss to the Government?

Mr. CHACE. Does the gentleman from Illinois refer to the Carlisle school?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. No; but to the industrial training-school in Illinois. I believe the same is the case everywhere. Now, at that particular institution to which I refer in Illinois the rate last year was $167 for each child, and it was alleged that was not enough. I do not profess to be familiar with the subject, but I simply ask the gentleman from Louisiana in charge of this bill whether that question has been raised. I hope the rate will be increased beyond $167 for each child, and I believe it will be not only to the advantage of the Indians themselves, but will not result in any material loss to the Government.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I know that some of the best industrial schools in this country, on the Indian reservations, will take these children, if the Commissioner will send them there, for $100 apiece.

Mr. ELLIS. That question was considered by the Committee on Appropriations, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois. In some Indian schools, especially those further east, where the expenses of living are higher, it was considered that $200 was not an exorbitant rate. Out in the West, nearer the Indian reservations, we regarded $167 was enough.

Mr. STEELE. The colloquy going on between the gentleman in charge of the bill and other members of the House seems to be more in the nature of a private colloquy.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been objected to by quite a number of gentlemen upon the floor, and the attention of the Chair has been called to it. It is impossible for gentlemen in other portions of the Hall to hear what is going on, and the Chair therefore will request gentlemen taking the floor to address the House to comply with the rule which requires them to address the Speaker.

Mr. ELLIS. If no other gentleman desires to ask me a question I will yield the floor, as I understand the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDEMAN] desires to say something on this bill.

Mr. HARDEMAN. Mr. Chairman, when St. John the Divine wrote his book of Revelations he wrote an injunction to the seven churches of Asia, saying to them: "He that hath an ear let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." I would like, sir, to emphasize that injunction upon the ear of the members of this House to-day during the short time that I will occupy the floor in this discussion. Recognizing, as I do, in all of its fullness the obligations of the General Government to carry out its treaty stipulations with the Indians, and knowing as I do that the interests of this bill will be ably conducted by the gentleman [Mr. ELLIS] having it in charge, I shall say nothing upon it, but shall endeavor to bring to the consideration of the House the question of the propriety of taking from the Speaker's table a bill reported from the Committee on Agriculture by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN] proposing to make the Agricultural Department one of the Cabinet bureaus of this Government, and ask its consideration and passage by this House.

Not belonging, sir, to any of the standing committees that gives an individual a right to the floor when he pleases and to speak when he chooses, I have to avail myself of the latitudinarian rule applicable to the Committee of the Whole in addressing the House on this question, and I merely ask a hearing for a short time while I shall endeavor to present the claims of that bill and the importance of the subject with which it deals. And for this privilege I am indebted to the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. RANDALL], the able member [Mr. ELLIS] who has the bill in charge, and to my young friend who stands as the right bower of our Speaker, and whom I have learned to regard as one of our most useful, important, and efficient public officials. I mean Mr. Crutchfield.

I am glad I can now consistently and cheerfully vote to sustain the report of the Committee on Agriculture in their recommendation to elevate the Bureau of Agriculture to a Cabinet position. As I said when the pleuro-pneumonia bill was under discussion, I had rather uphold than weaken the arm that would strike a blow on this floor to secure for agriculture a proper recognition from the law-makers of the country. For what does the committee ask? Simply to give to agriculture that position in the councils of your Government which her importance and vast capabilities and necessities demand. The interests to be subserved by such a course are many and all-controlling, for upon them rest the prosperity of this country and the general welfare of the people. No one will gainsay the fact that agriculture is the foundation upon which is built every other industry. It enlarges our income, furnishes our exports, builds up our commerce, supplies our factories; in fine, enters into every art, every calling, every trade, every industry in the land. No business is independent of its aid, and no government can afford to ignore its claims. As has been said by Dr. Johnson, "it not only gives riches to a nation, but the only riches she can call her own." It is the barometer that marks the rise and fall of nations.

Rome's decay dates from the decline of her agriculture, and every nation that does not foster and encourage it retards its own growth, if it does not court its own downfall. Its relations to our Government are too close and important to be ignored by our legislators. It is the very life and soul of the Republic. It stretches out its arm and lays hold of that country's business in all its channels and ramifications. Look at your trade relations and tell me, what would they be without its support and supply? Look at your export trade, amounting in the last fiscal year to $804,223,632; of this large amount agriculture furnished $619,269,449—77 per cent. of the total value. It may be a matter of interest, considering its bearing on this question, to mark its growth in the export trade of the country. In 1850 it furnished $108,605,713 worth of products; 1860, $256,560,972; 1870, $361,188,483; 1883, $619,269,449; nearly doubling every decade. Of this last amount for 1883, $247,328,721 came from the raw cotton of the cotton-growing States; $208,040,850 from the grain and cattle growing States. Now, sir, from what investments came these large exportations? There are in the farms in this country 536,081,835 acres farm land, valued at $10,197,096,776; farm implements, valued at $406,520,055; live-stock, valued at $2,467,868,524.

In addition to the capital invested, see the number of persons engaged in it. By your last census out of a population of 36,761,607 persons above the age of 10 years 17,390,990 were engaged in different occupations; of this number 7,670,493 persons were engaged in agriculture, 3,837,112 persons were engaged in manufacture, leaving 5,883,385 persons engaged in all other occuptions.

You see, sir, how many of your fellow-countrymen (nearly one-half of those having any calling) are engaged in the noble work of agriculture. How many are enlisted in your armies and how many are afloat upon your waters? A comparatively small number, and yet to look after these soldiers and sailors and the interests they are organized to protest you have two Departments of the Government and spend annually millions of dollars. While I make no war upon these Departments, I have thought both economy and efficiency demand they should be united under one head. But that is foreign to this discussion, and I only alluded to it to show, if it was important to have these two Departments, I assert, because of the great growth of agriculture in this country and of the magnitude of the interest connected with and dependent upon it, there is also an urgent necessity for this Department of Government, and the vital interest of the country demands that the labor of the country, comprising, as I have shown, about half of your population over 10 years of age, should have a voice in the councils of the Government. This is an age of progress and development in art, in science, in mechanics, and manufacture. These industries are mostly in our cities and towns and can avail themselves of all the appliances and essentials to growth and advancement.

Agriculturists, from the nature of their vocation, are scattered and segregated, and can not therefore be reached as readily with sources of information and supplied with means of improvement; hence the greater necessity for an organized head who can look after the agricultural interest of the country, its industrial policy, its far-reaching influences, who will successfully stimulate improvements in culture, in fertilization, in scientific methods and soil tests, and above all who can present her claims around the high council board of the country. Upon what subject for Cabinet discussion has she not some interest, direct or remote? Who more interested in domestic or foreign commerce, in the carrying trade of the country, in the financial policy of the Government, every change of which effects them as sensitively as the weather changes do the flowers; in its commercial relations, in its educational systems, in its social and political economy, in its laws of revenue and taxation, than the agriculturists of the country? And yet, sir, agriculture has no voice around your council-boards, while others less strong in numbers and certainly no more useful members of the body politic have there their heads of Departments to guard their interests and advance their cause.

"But," say you, "this can be done under the present organization of the Department." Sir, I deny it; as at present organized the very efficient head of that Department can do but little else than formulate tables and distribute seed. His hands are tied by his subordinate position and his efficiency is impaired because he has to speak through another (often not in full sympathy with him) of the wants of his Department, of the industrial necessities of the country and the policies most essential to the growth of our industries and the advancement of that profession which underlies our prosperity as a people and our greatness as a Government. How long, sir, will the labor of the country, which at last is the capital of the country, be denied its proper place in the councils of that country? Here is a spectacle at which you can look with ever-increasing wonder: that the great industries of the nation, those that make its commerce, run its factories, fire its forges, dig its mines, build its cities, populate its workshops, and feed and clothe its people, industries in which every man, woman, and child in this broad land are deeply interested, are voiceless in the councils of your Government. Are not those who make the wealth of the country entitled to some of the benefits and honors of the Government? Are not the arts of peace as essential to a nation's prosperity and growth as those of war? If so, let them stand upon an equal footing in the high courts of your Government. Let it not be longer said that agriculture (and I might add other industries) occupies a more subordinate place and has less done for it in the United States than in most of the civilized nations on earth. "In 1877," said the master of the last National Grange, in his excellent address, "France appropriated for agriculture and commerce over $20,000,000; Russia, for agriculture and public lands, nearly $15,000,000; Austria and Hungary, for agriculture alone, $5,500,000; Great Britain, $800,000; Sweden, $650,000; the United States for the same year, only $174,686.

I hold, Mr. Speaker, that it is to the interest of the Government that every member in that Government should feel his own personal relation to it, his dependence upon and connection with it. Such a feeling nerves his patriotic impulses and instills into his bosom a greater love for that Government; and the closer that relationship (if it be not a forced one) the stronger will be that attachment. Acting upon this principle, I would bring the farmer face to face with the powers that govern. I would have him feel that his great industry is receiving from the Government the consideration it deserves; not in the way of burdens, for we all know how much of the burdens of Government are borne by the agriculture of the country. Sir, she is willing to bear her proportional part; this she will do without complaint; and she is further willing, sir, if necessary, in your tax laws raising revenue for the general purposes of the Government, that you should give (as far as can be done justly) incidental protection to the struggling industries of the country, for labor sympathizes with labor the world over; but, sir, while assenting to all this, she demands, while you tax her products, while she contributes to your export trade more, largely more, than all other industries combined, while she has more persons engaged in her pursuits than in any other calling, who have so long and so patiently borne the inequalities of your tax laws, of your transportation systems, your trade laws, and your cold neglect—I say, in view of all these facts, she only demands a representation among those who shape the policy of Government and control its affairs.

I ask you, sir, in view of the great interest involved, the large number interested, the great benefits that will accrue from it, is this an unreasonable request of the farmers of the country? Sir, the policy of this Government toward agriculture has been instrumental in retarding the growth of the country. As the great and gifted Webster said, Agriculture, as far as the Government is concerned, is left to swim if it can, sink if it must. She has been isolated on account of governmental neglect, and has not realized in all its fullness the importance of manufacturing industries to her success. Sir, this policy should cease, and agriculture should be drawn from her isolated position and brought in contact, close and intimate, with the manufacturing and other industries of the country, for these are absolutely essential to her growth and prosperity. Let labor be brought in association with labor. Bring her out from the retirement into which your neglect has driven her and let her take that high position in matters of government that her importance and vast resources demand. Make for her, and other industries if you prefer, a department of state, known as the department of agriculture and industry, where they will have a voice in defending and advancing their interests. Let that department have every facility necessary to accomplish the great objects contemplated in its creation. Equip it for practical and scientific experiments. Make its botanical, entomological, statistical, chemical, and mechanical branches equal to the progressive spirit of the age. Enable it by analyses of soils, vegetable products, fertilizers, and other materials to satisfy the growing demand of the farmers of the country for this information, so important to successful culture and development.

Who, sir, can overestimate the value of the statistician, the entomologist, the botanist, the chemist to the agriculturist, ay, sir, to the country? The elevation of the bureau to a Cabinet position will enthuse new life into the Departments and new hopes and new courage into the hearts of the honest tillers of the soil, and these will redound to the best interests of the country. Make this department, then, one worthy of the Government and its greatest industry, not simply a bureau of seeds and Congressional canvass plants, and the agriculturists of the country will realize from your action that justice, though tardy, has at last been awarded them by a government so dependent upon them for material prosperity and financial independence. "But," says one, "it is creating an additional office and thereby increasing the expenses of the Government." Sir, it is not adding to the number of officers; it is only elevating the office and officer to the dignity of a Cabinet position. I grant you it will cost a few thousand dollars more. Suppose it does. Who bears the burdens of your Government? Who pays more into your Treasury, who brings you more prosperity than your agriculturists, and who, therefore, should be more entitled to a fair and equitable consideration from the Government? As you elevate and advance this industry you advance the growth and wealth of your Government.

No one can deny the assertion that agricultural organizations and bureaus have been instrumental agencies in elevating agriculture, increasing its production, and enlarging its power and usefulness. And, sir, as agriculture grows in position and independence she stretches out her arms after other industries, and in these diversified pursuits may be found the grand elements of a nation's wealth and a people's prosperity. The Government could adopt no wiser policy than to encourage and foster it. Aid it by all the means in your power, and as you develop its great resources, other industries, that necessarily go hand in hand with it, will spring up, manufactures will be established, cities will be built, and this country, already made rich from field and farm and dairy and workshop, will grow in greatness as she grows in years.

I am aware, sir, there is a disposition among some to ridicule every attempt to advance art, science, physics, and mechanics that is ahead of the intelligence of the age. This has been the history of progress for generations. Morse was ridiculed as a visionary and a wild enthusiast in the Halls of our Congress when asking for aid to his electric invention, yet his ridiculers are dead and forgotten, while Morse's name will be transmitted to posterity as long as his electric current encircles the civilized world. The astronomer, looking through his lenses and his simple telescope made of rude materials, was ridiculed as a star-gazing simpleton or a moon-stricken monomaniac, yet the starry spheres will hymn forever the praises of Kepler and Herschel, while Jupiter and Saturn will sound on and on down the ages the name of Gallileo.

The scientists were subjected to criticism and derision as they watched in thoughtful study the boiling water and the humble vessel that contained it, yet the world now bows in homage to their discoveries, while the mighty engine wheeling across continents the commerce of nations carries to the generations the fame of Watt, and the bursting billow ploughed by the ocean steamer dirges in eternal cadence a requiem to Fulton. As it was in the past so is it now. Sceptics doubt, while science progresses. The world is demanding a higher civilization. The earth is developing new mines of wealth, and improved science must secure her treasures. The heavens marching to the music of the spheres invite to other conquests in the far-off worlds in the infinity above. Old ocean, lashed by the fury of the storm or calm as the nature of "its own mysterious source," sings a ceaseless song of progress, while science levies tribute upon its waters, and commerce interlocks the hands of nations amid the surges of its billows. Nature in all her elements speaks of progress and development and we can not as a people stop to listen to the jeers of the sneerer or to place the fingers of the doubting Thomases of the age.

Labor, sir, asks for aid to keep pace with this progressive age, and, recognizing her just claims, I will do all in my power to elevate agricultural and mechanical industries and thereby enlist in their pursuits more of the young men of the country. I believe a proper recognition by the Government of these industries would dignify and encourage the labor of the country. It is for the tillers of the soil and for the sons of toil I speak to-day, and ask this humble recognition of their claims by the Congress of the United States. Your soldiers are represented by your War Department, your sailors have a mouthpiece in the Navy Department, your bankers and merchants and bondholders are heard through your Treasury Department, your judiciary has been supplied with a Department of Justice; why not provide a department of agriculture and labor for the toiling millions engaged in the industries of the country? My appeal is indorsed by a convention of nearly three hundred delegates of intelligent agriculturists of my own State, whose memorial I have laid upon your table. Its indorsement comes from every factory in the land, whose poorly paid operatives often strike for bread; it comes from your furnaces and forges, whose fires are too often extinguished because of an improper estimate by capitalists of the wages of the toilers therein; it comes from the fields of our agriculturists, where every upturned sod tells of mortgage-deeds and credit-liens. From every section of this land whose history is being written in the tears of toil "and the sweat of the poor" the appeal comes—honor and dignify the labor of the country. Heed that appeal, my countrymen, to-day, or that long-neglected labor may hold up the garments bleeding Cæsar wore and point to the rents and cuts made by Cassius, the envious Casca, and beloved Brutus, that they—

> May ruffle up your spirits, and put a tongue
> In every wound of (Toil) that shall move
> The stones themselves to rise and mutiny.

Protect your labor, and it will protect you; elevate it, and it will redound to the welfare of your country; advance and nourish it, and joy will brighten the face of toil with smiles, comfort will gladden every homestead, happiness crown every altar, while general prosperity will smile upon your country, already the idol of its people, the exemplar of nations, a model for the world. [Applause.]

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, I now ask that the bill be read by paragraphs, for debate and amendment under the five-minute rule.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I would like to be heard for a time upon this bill in the general debate.

Mr. ELLIS. Would the gentleman from Texas indicate the time that he wishes to occupy?

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I suppose not exceeding half an hour.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask the question because I would like to fix the time, if possible, in which the general debate will close.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I shall be as brief as possible.

Mr. ELLIS. I withdraw the motion temporarily.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Mr. Chairman, in arising to address the committee upon this bill I wish to say that I do not take the floor for the purpose of opposing the bill particularly, but with the view of calling the attention of the committee to some of its features and also to give expression briefly to my views upon our Indian policy. I believe, sir, the management of our Indian affairs is erroneous in almost every respect. I believe our Indian policy is detrimental to the Indians, and results in little good to the Government. I believe that the Indian affairs of the country, by adopting a different policy than the one heretofore pursued, can be carried out much more economically to the Government and with far greater benefits to the Indians themselves. But I do not propose to enter to any great extent upon the discussion of that subject at this time. I desire merely to call the attention of the committee to some of the features of this bill, more with a view to their correction in future legislation than to attempt to improve upon the pending measure.

We find upon examination of the bill that there is a provision made for the salaries of sixty Indian agents, and also for the salaries of four special agents. It is clear to my mind, and it has been the view of many members of Congress heretofore familiar with the subject, that this expenditure for the salaries of these sixty-four Indian agents could all be saved to the Government. The amount appropriated by this bill for sixty regular agents and for four special agents is $96,900.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have an army and we have officers of that army who are far more familiar with the Indians, with their wants and needs and with their habits than any agents who can be selected from civil life and appointed to manage their affairs. We have an abundance of Army officers that can be spared from the regular line of duty and assigned to these agencies without detriment to the Army, and with great benefit to the Indian service. By selecting Army officers for this duty you secure men familiar with Indian character, and who from long habit, experience, and thorough training would understand the treaties and laws, the obligations of the Government and rights of the Indians, and who would, from interest and duty, take pride in seeing the laws faithfully executed and the Indians protected in their rights in fullest manner.

From my own experience, and long acquaintance with many Indian tribes, I can safely say that they prefer and have requested, time and again, that officers of the Army should act as their agents. They have more confidence in them. They are in familiar intercourse with them, and when in war they have been taught to dread and respect these officers. And, sir, by doing away with the appointment of these agents from civil life officers of experience could be selected from the retired-list of the Army who would rather be employed in that manner than remain in idleness.

As I have already said, the Indians have respect for the officers of the Army. They have not been unfairly treated by them. They have not been robbed, defrauded, or cheated when they have been in contact and dealing with them. Therefore, and to dismiss this part of the subject, I believe it would be a wise policy on the part of the Government to change its entire law so far as the appointment of these Indian agents is concerned. It would be a saving of from $80,000 to $100,000 annually.

There is another feature of this bill to which I wish to call attention, that provides for four Indian inspectors. What is the object of these inspectors? I suppose the object is to visit the different agencies and see that the agents fulfill their obligations to the Government and to the Indians. Why would it not be best, sir, for the Government to appoint five officers of the Army doing military service in the region of country where these Indians are located that they may make the inspections and report to the Government whether the obligations of the agents had been properly discharged and the supplies furnished the Indians such as the contracts required. If that was done it would save the salaries, $12,500, of these inspectors now appointed from civil life.

I desire to call the attention of my friend from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] who has charge of this bill, and also of the members of the Committee of the Whole, to some other features of the bill. On pages 6 and 7 of the printed bill I find an appropriation "for contingencies of the Indian service, including traveling and incidental expenses of Indian agents, and of their offices, and traveling and incidental expenses of agents, and for pay of employés not otherwise provided for," &c., of $40,000. What does that paragraph mean? It must mean that for the traveling and incidental expenses of these agents, and employés of the whole Indian service generally, there is to be used the sum of $40,000. It strikes me that that is a large appropriation for the purpose; yet it may be necessary. I have just noticed the paragraph on pages 6 and 7 making this appropriation, which evidently alludes to the traveling and incidental expenses of all the Indian agents. On pages 42, 43, and 44 of the bill we find various appropriations for incidental expenses. The first one is "for general incidental expenses of the Indian service, including traveling expenses of agents in Arizona, support and civilization of Indians," &c., $25,000. Now, that is in part a reappropriation for the same purpose—contingencies, incidental and traveling expenses; that is appropriated for on pages 6 and 7 of the bill. What part of that is for traveling expenses? And so it goes on. In every paragraph on pages 42, 43, and 44 an appropriation is made "for general incidental expenses of the Indian service, including traveling expenses of agents," &c. Is that necessary? I respectfully ask why these various appropriations for the same service and for the same purpose are made?

Mr. EATON. Has the gentleman summed up the total amount of these appropriations?

Mr. THROCKMORTON. No, sir; I have not had the time, but it is a large sum.* I propose now briefly to notice that part of the bill relating to the Indian schools, and will call the attention of the members of the Committee of the Whole to those appropriations. On almost every page of this bill, down to about page 42 I believe, there is an appropriation for schools and for school-houses. Those appropriations in part are made in pursuance of treaty stipulations with the different tribes and bands of Indians. As a matter of course that is right. Where treaties have stipulated for these schools and school-teachers the Government should carry out the contract to the very letter, even beyond the letter of the treaty, so far as my judgment goes. But I desire to call the particular attention of the committee to page 7 of this printed bill, where will be found this item of appropriation:

For school buildings and teachers, as provided for by article 7, treaty of October 21, 1867, $5,000.

Then immediately following is this item:

For pay of physician and teachers, $2,500.

These two appropriations are for the same tribes of Indians and are made under the same treaty. You find in two contiguous paragraphs two appropriations for the same purpose, which I think is not warranted by the treaty. These appropriations are for the Apaches, Kiowas, and Comanches under the treaty of October 21, 1867. That treaty will be found in volume 15, Statutes at Large, commencing on page 581. Article 7 of that treaty provides:

In order to insure the civilization of the tribes entering into this treaty, the necessity of education is admitted, especially by such of them as are or may be settled on said agricultural reservations; and they therefore pledge themselves to compel their children, male and female, between the ages of 6 and 16 years, to attend school; and it is hereby made the duty of the agent for said Indians to see that this stipulation is strictly complied with; and the United States agrees that for every thirty children between said ages who can be induced or compelled to attend school a house shall be provided and a teacher competent to teach the elementary branches of an English education shall be furnished, who will reside among said Indians and faithfully discharge his or her duties as a teacher. The provisions of this article to continue for not less that twenty years.

This is the provision of the treaty whence comes the authority for making the appropriation for school buildings and teachers contained in the first paragraph which I have read from page 7 of the printed bill. In the same treaty, article 14, it is provided:

The United States hereby agrees to furnish annually to the Indians the physician, teachers, carpenter, miller, engineer, farmer, and blacksmiths, as herein contemplated, and that such appropriations shall be made from time to time, on the estimates of the Secretary of the Interior, as will be sufficient to employ such persons.

"As herein contemplated;" that is, contemplated in article 7 of this same treaty. Now, does article 14 of this treaty, which binds the Government to furnish teachers "as herein contemplated," justify or warrant this reappropriation for teachers? Provision for teachers must be made once under this treaty, but there is no warrant in it for a reappropriation, and I do not see how the Committee on Appropriations can justify the appropriation of $2,500 "for pay of physician and teachers" made in the second paragraph which I have referred to.

I do not know how often these reappropriations occur in this bill; I have not had the time to go through the bill to ascertain. On page 8 of the bill, line 169, I find this item:

For pay of physician and teachers, as per thirteenth article of treaty, $2,100.

That is the treaty with the Cheyennes and Arapahoes. In that treaty will be found precisely the same provision which I have read from the treaty with the Kiowas and Comanches. In article 13 of that treaty will be found the provision that a teacher shall be provided for, &c. Then immediately following the paragraph I have read is another making an appropriation of $5,000 "for school buildings and teachers." There is no warrant in the treaty for it, and there is no necessity for it.

Then, on page 28 of the printed bill, for the Shoshones and Bannocks will be found an appropriation for teachers in each of two different paragraphs. Yet the provision of the treaty with those Indians is the same as the provision I have read from the treaty with the Kiowas, Comanches,

*In response to Mr. EATON's inquiry, in addition to the general appropriation of $40,000 applicable to the Indian service, "including traveling and incidental expenses of Indian agents," on pages 42, 43, and 44 there are special appropriations for various agencies, "including traveling expenses of agents," the further sum of $104,000. How much of this sum is to be allowed for traveling and incidental expenses I can not determine, as the bill is silent on that subject.

and Cheyennes. I do not know whether there are other appropriations of the same character in reference to other tribes of Indians. But they do occur certainly in regard to the three tribes I have mentioned.

Now, sir, further in regard to these schools for Indians. I find by footing up the amounts that there is appropriated for schools under treaty stipulations, at the agencies or on the reservations where these Indians live, the sum of $279,744. Then, on pages 38 and 39 of the bill, there is a general sum of $400,000 appropriated, as follows:

For support of Indian day and industrial schools, and for other educational purposes not hereinafter provided for, for construction and repair of school buildings, and for purchase of cattle and sheep for schools, $400,000; and no portion of this sum, nor of any other sum appropriated by this act for the support of Indian schools, shall be paid for service rendered by any scholar taught in said schools, &c.

I am not advised, nor do I know under authority of what treaty this appropriation has heretofore been made, or is now to be made by Congress. I do not oppose it. I am not disposed to oppose it. I am willing to extend every aid and encouragement to the Indians in the way of education that Congress can extend. But, sir, there are features in regard to these schools and the education of these Indians which, it strikes me, are entirely erroneous and ought not to be adopted or continued by Congress.

In addition to that, I find on page 39 an appropriation of $15,000 for education of Indians in Alaska. Is there a treaty or any other obligation upon which to base this appropriation? Has any stipulation been entered into by the Government of the United States with the Indians of Alaska? I find also an appropriation of $31,500 for a school at Arkansas City; an appropriation of $76,000 for a school at Carlisle, Pa.; an appropriation of $45,500 for a school at Forest Grove, Oreg.; an appropriation of $21,500 for a school at Genoa, Nebr.; an appropriation of $21,900 for a school at Hampton, Va.; an appropriation of $60,280 for a school at Lawrence, Kans.; an appropriation of $33,400 for the Lincoln school at Philadelphia, Pa.; an appropriation of $4,000 for the Eastern Cherokees, and $75,000 for all other schools in any State or Territory. So that we have appropriations under the various treaties for schools on the reservations and at the Indian agencies of something over $270,000; for Alaska, $15,000; for the Arkansas City school, for building for employés at said school and pay of superintendent, $31,500; for support of Indian industrial school at Carlisle, for transportation of children to and from said school, and an allowance to Capt. R. H. Pratt, in charge, the sum of $76,000; for support of Indian industrial school at Forest Grove, Oreg., pay of superintendent, purchase of land and erection of buildings, $46,500; for the school at Genoa and pay of superintendent, $21,500; for support and education of one hundred and twenty Indian children at Hampton, Va., and transportation to and from school, $21,900; for support and education of three hundred and forty children, pay of superintendent, teams, wagons, and farm implements, for manual-labor school, at Lawrence, Kans., $60,280; for care and support and education of two hundred Indian children at Lincoln school, Philadelphia, $30,400; and for other schools not herein provided, $75,000; thus, sir, making a total of more than $1,000,000 appropriated by this bill for schools, support of schools, buildings, &c.

Mr. Chairman, allow me to state the great objection to the appropriations for these schools. Take, for instance, the school at Hampton, Va., and the schools at Carlisle and Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania. These are located thousands of miles away from where the Indians reside, and a part of these appropriations is for the expense of transporting Indian children to and from those several schools. If the Government is to do this work, why could not schools be established in some civilized portion of the western country contiguous to the Indians to be educated? Are not the people of Kansas, of Iowa, of Nebraska, of Oregon, of California possessed of sufficient enlightenment and scholarship to justify the Government in establishing schools there, instead of locating them in these States remote from where the Indians reside?

It strikes me it is time for Congress to halt in these wild and loose appropriations. You may examine this bill from beginning to end without being able to sift out and determine specifically the purposes for which the different appropriations are made. You find paragraph after paragraph providing appropriations for "support and subsistence and civilization" of these Indians. Now I would like the committee to inform us how much in these several cases is for "support" and how much for "civilization." Why not get down to the true rule and make the appropriations specific, naming in the bill the exact purpose for which each appropriation is made? No one can gainsay that such is the proper mode of making appropriations.

Taking up this question of civilization, I desire to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the different paragraphs in this bill appropriating enormous sums for the civilization of these Indians. Under what authority of treaty has the Government undertaken to do these things? Let me call attention to a paragraph in one of the treaties—and my criticism will apply equally to other cases—to ascertain whether these enormous appropriations for the civilization of Indians are justified by any treaty stipulation. I read from one of these treaties at random. On page 583 of volume 15 of the Statutes at Large I find the following:

In order to insure the civilization of the tribes entering into this treaty, the necessity of education is admitted, especially by such of them as are or may be settled on said agricultural reservations; and they therefore pledge themselves to compel their children, male and female, between the ages of 6 and 16, to attend school; and it is hereby made the duty of the agent for said Indians to see that this stipulation is strictly complied with; and the United States agrees that for every thirty children between the said ages who can be induced or compelled to attend school a house shall be provided and a teacher competent to teach the elementary branches of an English education shall be furnished, who will reside among said Indians and faithfully discharge his or her duties as a teacher. The provisions of this article to continue for not less than twenty years.

This is the modest and seemingly wise provision of the treaty. It specifies how the civilization shall be brought about, what the Government shall do in order to secure the civilization of the Indians. It is provided that a school-house shall be built for this tribe; that a teacher shall be employed competent to teach the elementary branches of an English education. But when we look at the appropriations in this bill for the particular tribes of Indians with whom this treaty stipulation was made we find on page 34, at line 811, the following:

For subsistence and civilization of the Arapahoes, Cheyennes, Apaches, Kiowas, Comanches, and Wichitas, who have been collected upon the reservations set apart for their use and occupation, $390,000.

Now, I ask my friend from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS], the chairman of the subcommittee, who has this bill in charge, how much of this appropriation of $390,000 is for subsistence and how much for civilization? Has not the committee made in a previous part of the bill, on the sixth page, all the appropriation that the treaty requires the Government to make for the civilization of these Indians?

Mr. ELLIS. No, sir.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I think you have.

Mr. ELLIS. I disagree with the gentleman.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Then the bill goes on, in the next paragraph:

For subsistence and civilization of Arickarees, Gros Ventres, and Mandans: For this amount, to be expended in such goods, provisions, and other articles as the President may, from time to time, determine, in instructing in agricultural and mechanical pursuits, in providing employés, educating children, procuring medicine and medical attendance, care for and support of the aged, sick, and infirm, for the helpless orphans of said Indians, and in any other respect to promote their civilization, comfort, and improvement, $40,000.

Now, there is provision in the treaty with these Indians for the building of school-houses and the employment of teachers, and that is provided for in another paragraph of this bill. Yet we have this additional appropriation for subsistence and civilization; and so the matter runs on through the bill, paragraph after paragraph. There are appropriations in the bill for "subsistence and civilization," and "support and civilization," and "education and civilization," &c., for "pay for employés," &c., under the head of miscellaneous supports, to the amount of $757,000. There is no means by which to determine how much is for support, or for civilization, or other purposes mentioned.

I have thought, Mr. Chairman, that it would not be inappropriate to call the attention of members of the Committee of the Whole to some of the provisions of this bill. I know that appropriations have been going on year after year, and sometimes there has been a gradual reduction; but it does appear to me that we should strike at the root of this entire policy which has been so long pursued by the Government in the management of Indian affairs.

There can be no justification for its continuance on the ground of humanity or religion—of benefits conferred upon the Indians or economy to the Government. Why, then, should not officers of the Army be assigned as agents and inspectors, instead of employing persons brought up in civil life far remote from the Indians, and who know but little of their character, habits, or needs? Such a change would work energy and efficiency in the service, and would bring about a system of accounts in the receipts and disbursements as accurate and systematic as that in the quartermaster and commissary departments of the Army. It would not only promote energy and efficiency, but it would secure to the Indians every cent of the appropriations made for their benefit, and at the same time secure a large saving annually to the Government.

Mr. Chairman, there is no one upon this floor or anywhere else who has more at heart the welfare and the advancement of the Indians of the country than I have. I believe that the Government should extend its protecting arms over them wherever it can; wherever there is an opportunity to do so it should secure their advancement and civilization. But, sir, we have in our statutes already enacted, in pursuance of treaties made with these Indian tribes and in appropriation laws enacted year after year, legislation that does not tend in my judgment always to the advancement and welfare of the Indians or to the economical administration of their affairs by the Government.

Mr. COX, of New York. Will it disturb my friend from Texas if I should ask him a question at this point?

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Not in the least.

Mr. COX, of New York. I should like a member so well accomplished in this matter as the gentleman from Texas to tell this committee why it is they get along with the Indians in the Dominion of Canada so much better than we do, while dealing with the Indians is so costly and expensive and troublesome in our own country.

Mr. HOLMAN. And fatal to the Indians as well.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I will allow my friend from Montana to answer that question.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Mr. Chairman, there are one or two reasons for that. In the first place, with pretty much the same number or about the same number of Indians, this country since the Declaration of Independence has increased to over 50,000,000 of population, and consequently the Indians have been crowded back, causing more points of irritation between the Indians and the white men, while the Canadian people in the same time have only grown to a population of 4,000,000 of people. And that very fact of the greater increase of our people in population is the reason of greater difficulties between our people and the Indians.

Mr. CHACE. And let me suggest to the gentleman from Montana that we started with a great many more Indians than the Canadians.

Mr. MAGINNIS. In another sense we started with a wrong policy, that is, the policy of making treaties with these Indian tribes as if they were foreign nations. I have heard it charged that the Government of the United States had treated the Indians with great cruelty and hardship. I have read books about "a century of dishonor," and yet I have to say if you take the intention of the laws and treaties with the Indians of the Government of the United States from the foundation of this Government down it will be agreed that no nation on the face of the earth has been so kind, so charitable, so mindful of the interests of these people. Yet, sir, it seems sometimes as if the very looseness and cleverness with which we have treated these conquered and decaying people has been the very worst policy we could have adopted. We have seen in Mexico, under the iron rule of the Spaniard, under the merciless treatment beginning with Cortez and his Conquistadores, that notwithstanding that cruel treatment of the Indian tribes there they have not only survived to the present day but have become important factors in the communities where they live, so that some of them have become the rulers of the land and Juarez recently the President of the Mexican Republic; while in our country, under our alternating system, sometimes of fighting the Indians and sometimes treating them with the greatest kindness, to-day making war upon them and to-morrow supplying them with rations, arms, and clothing—I say under this alternate policy our administration of Indian affairs has been not only costly and troublesome but about the worst that could have been adopted. It is a remarkable fact that when Custer and his people were massacred on the Big Horn this country saw two armies, one its own legitimate, organized Army, uniformed and paid for by the Government, and the other the Indian army, both equipped, armed, furnished with powder, and each put into the field one against the other by the same Government.

Mr. COX, of New York. But that does not answer my question.

Mr. MAGINNIS. No, it does not; and yet it is an important matter to be considered in this connection.

Another reason, Mr. Chairman, why in the Dominion of Canada they have not had so much trouble is because they adopted the policy from the beginning that instead of allowing the Indians to govern themselves as if they were separate sovereignties, instead of having one law for the Indians and another law for the white people, both whites and Indians were placed under the same laws of Great Britain, and that policy was carried out to such an extent that if a white man killed or in any way injured an Indian he was tried and punished for it, and if an Indian killed or in any way injured a white man he was tried under the same laws, and if convicted was punished precisely as a white man would be under like circumstances. That is the policy of simple justice, and is best adapted to all conditions of men.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Now, sir, in pursuance of the thought suggested by my friend from Montana, and recurring to the idea that these Indians should be under the control of the War Department, I desire to make this statement: that it is a matter of notoriety, and especially on the frontier, that these Indians have entered into treaties with the Government, that they have attended councils and received presents, that they have signed agreements and treaties that they would not depredate upon the property or lives of the citizens of the United States, and they have furthermore agreed that if any such depredation took place on the part of any members of their tribes they would give up the offender to be punished by our laws, and that if they did not give up the offender to be punished by our laws then they would make good out of the appropriation under the treaties to them in the shape of annuities whatever damage had been done to our citizens.

Now, what has been the result of these stipulations? We have seen, Mr. Chairman, the laws violated every day in the year, and year after year, until the blood of our citizens has dyed the frontiers from Oregon and California and Texas to Kansas. All their frontiers have been deluged with the blood of our citizens; the lives and property of the people of these States and Territories have been ruthlessly destroyed in violation of the treaties. I call upon this committee now to point out a single instance where any Indian has ever been punished for a violation of their treaty obligations.

There is but one case on record so far as my information extends, and that, sir, was in pursuance of the laws of my own State, when three of the chiefs and their followers attacked a Government train, murdered seven or eight of the men and wounded four others of the party, where they had tied one of the wounded men to a wagon-wheel and burned him to death, destroyed the Government supplies, burned the wagons and property they could not carry away, and then leisurely returned to their reservation with their plunder and boasted of their achievement. This happened almost under the eye of General Sherman. When he was in Texas inspecting the forts he narrowly escaped being massacred himself by the same band. The troops pursued the Indians to the reservation at Fort Sill. When General Sherman reached there these chiefs, the leaders of the massacre, and their braves, with their trophies, scalps, and the sixty mules taken from the wagon-train which was carrying provisions to the soldiers at Fort Griffin, were on the reservation parading about in defiance of the agent and his authority. General Sherman acted promptly, had the three chiefs arrested and sent them to the civil authorities of Texas, where two of them were tried and sentenced to the penitentiary. One of them died in the penitentiary and the other was released at the solicitation of the Indian Department, and for another disobedience I believe is now in a prison of some other part of the country.

This is the only instance, I believe, where these people have been punished under criminal law for a violation of their treaty obligations. So that this policy which we have pursued toward the Indians, this appointment of agents who have allowed or been powerless to prevent these depredations, cruelties, and outrages, has had as a natural consequence the result of inducing the Indians to believe that they could with impunity violate their treaties and set at defiance the Army of the country and the laws of the land.

Mothers and daughters have been captured, and in the presence of each other subjected to cruelties and atrocities too horrible and shocking to be recounted. Women have been carried to the reservations, where their friends and neighbors have followed and found them, and yet were not permitted to approach near enough to converse with them; and only after weeks and months of cruel torture and painful solicitations and negotiations for ransom were they released. And all this known to the agents and under the very eye of the military power of the Government, which was powerless though willing to redress the outrage, because not allowed or invoked under the miserable policy so long pursued by the Government. Would an officer of the Army, responsible to the War Department as an agent have permitted these things? No, sir. If officers had been agents, with the power of the Army to enforce obedience, these outrages would not have occurred.

Mr. ELLIS. Does not the gentleman from Texas know that in nineteen cases out of twenty the cause of the outrages has been the encroachments of the white man upon the Indians?

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I undertake to say that the gentleman from Louisiana knows nothing about it; nothing.

Mr. ELLIS. I undertake to say that I do.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Well, suppose that the gentleman from Louisiana is right, was not the Government at fault all the same for not punishing these white men and restraining the Indians? It is the business of all governments to prevent such outrages. That is the cause not only of the destruction of the whites but of the Indians.

But even if the gentleman's position be right, it was, I maintain, the place of the Government to step in and punish the white man and restrain the Indians from going to war.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Louisiana has spent a very useful life in one of the civilized and enlightened cities of our Republic. I have spent my life from early boyhood upon the borders of Texas, and I know whereof I speak. There have no doubt been a great many instances where the white people have been the aggressors and brought about Indian wars. I know that the cupidity of white men, the inhumanity, the treachery, it may be, which has often been exercised toward the Indians, and in a manner that can not be approved, has often led to outbreaks. But for forty years of my life have I known of Indian wars and depredations and there have been very rare cases in my State where the Indians have committed depredations incited by wrongful acts of white people.

It was our fortune in the days of the republic and afterward when we were a State to have one of the kindliest and most enlightened statesmen of this or any other country as president and governor; a man beloved and revered by the Indians everywhere throughout the South and West; a man that inaugurated in Texas in the days of its infancy an enlightened and humane Indian policy——

Mr. COX, of New York. Houston.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Houston; and yet with all of his sagacity and love for the Indian people, with all of his humanity and determination to protect them, they violated over and over again the treaties made with them. They signed the treaties, and, after making them, committed depredations year after year. Always in Texas from the days of the republic until within the last few years, when civilization reached her with the arteries of commerce and girdled her with iron arms, there has been one continued scene of cruelty, murder, and rapine. It was not occasional, not only yearly, but even monthly and weekly, and only since the railroads have penetrated the interior of that region and crossed the length and breadth of the State has it been that peace has been restored.

Mr. Chairman, while I say these things with the view of calling attention of the committee to them, it is with no feeling of hostility to the Indians. I have mingled with them, made treaties with them, and have friends among them whom I esteem and whose interests I desire to promote. I feel and know that I am esteemed by the Indians whose treaties I have been reading to-day.

It is for their benefit, it is for humanity's sake, it is for the economical administration of this Government, it is for the promotion of the civilization and advancement of these Indians, that I speak to-day. Take the five civilized tribes of Indians, the Cherokees, the Choctaws, the Chickasaws, the Creeks, and the Seminoles, erect them into a territorial government, give them a governor from among their own number—and they have among them men of talent, ability, and enlightenment—make them citizens, give them a Territorial government and give them a Delegate on this floor to represent their interests; abolish their agency and deal directly with their authorities, and you will do more for their advancement and for their good and for the good of the country than has been accomplished by all the legislation from the time the first treaty was made with these Cherokees and the other nations mentioned in the earlier history of our country.

Take the other Indians where they are settled on reservations, where they show a disposition to become herdsmen or to cultivate the soil; give them the right of citizenship, the right to appear before your courts and obtain redress for their wrongs and grievances; establish courts for them; break up these vast landed estates given them by the Government into severalties, so that every one shall have his quota of land, and whenever they have shown a disposition to remain on it for any length of time, to cultivate it, to graze it, and a willingness to send their children to school—when they advance this far, become attached to their homes, and many of them have already reached that point, give them a patent, give them the fee-simple to the land. When you do these things you will solve this great Indian problem in a way that will redound more to their benefit and the glory of our country than any other legislation that Congress can enact.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would ask the gentleman from Louisiana in charge of this bill what provision is made in it for additional educational facilities among the tribes, for the establishment of new schools and the extension of the educational system?

Mr. ELLIS. One hundred and thirty-four thousand dollars in excess of the appropriations of last year. The gentleman from Michigan will find the items beginning at line 929.

Now I ask that the bill be read by paragraphs for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks that the bill be read by paragraphs for amendment. The Chair hears no objection.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs, and read the following under the head "Pay of sixty agents of Indian affairs:"

At the New York agency, at $1,000.

Mr. BREWER, of New York. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "$1,000" and insert "$1,500;" so that it will read: "At the New York agency, at $1,500."

Mr. BREWER, of New York. This New York agency includes the whole State of New York, and $1,000 for an agent located in one part of the State is not a sufficient compensation.

Mr. ELLIS. As to this item I will state that the amount hitherto has been $1,200. That was decreased by the committee $200. We thought these tribes were in a good condition and that very little duties accordingly devolved upon the agent, and that $1,000 was sufficient compensation.

Mr. BREWER, of New York. These tribes are scattered all over the State of New York, and as the agency is situated at one point I think $1,000 is not enough.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 37, noes 40.

Mr. BREWER, of New York. I call for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. ELLIS, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. BREWER.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit to the Chair that the point of no quorum was not raised.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposed the call for tellers was based on the ground that a quorum had not voted, and therefore ordered tellers without submitting the question to the committee.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 57, noes 59.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HORR. I desire to propose an amendment to both lines 108 and 109, which are as follows:

At the Mackinac agency, at $1,000.
At the New York agency, at $1,000.

I propose to strike out "$1,000" in each line and insert in lieu of that amount "$1,200."

I wish to say to the committee that these two agencies in New York and Michigan are the only two to my recollection that were stricken down in this entire bill, and the work of these two agencies has been in no sense diminished since last year. I can not speak so advisedly as to the New York agency as I can as to the Michigan agency, for I know the duties of the agent there. We have in that State about 8,000 Indians. They are scattered all over the State into five or six different divisions. Difficulties are constantly arising between the Indians and the settlers, who are attempting to wrong them in some way in reference to their lands. Other questions of supervision are constantly arising, so that we need an agent all the while to protect these tribes. The agent now only gets the paltry sum of $100 per month. I submit to this House that $1,200 per annum is in no way excessive. This bill, as I think without any reason, cuts down the compensation to $1,000.

While saying this I wish to say to the House that as a whole this bill in my judgment is made in a spirit of fairness. It is as a whole a just bill, and I am heartily in favor of it as it is now framed, and as it comes from the Committee on Appropriations. But I do think in these two little items it will be an improvement to put the pay of those agents back to what it has been for years, and which is not in any sense excessive. I do not believe that any one who is familiar with the dutes of these two offices will for a moment dispute that if those agents do their duty they earn $100 per month. I do hope the Committee of the Whole will amend the bill in these two little items.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan a question.

Mr. HORR. Very well.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the amount named in the bill of last year for this purpose was $1,200?

Mr. HORR. Yes; $1,200 a year for each of these agents. There is no dispute about that.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. And do I understand the gentleman also to say that the Michigan and New York agencies are the only agencies where the compensation of the agent is cut down?

Mr. HORR. Yes; the only agencies that I now recollect. I have no recollection of any other reduction of this kind in regard to agents where they have precisely the same amount of work to do that they have had to do for years past. I do not think any one can possibly vote against the amendment I have offered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] applies to the New York agency.

The CHAIRMAN. And also to the Mackinac agency.

Mr. HOLMAN. The appropriation for the New York agency was voted on but a moment ago.

Mr. HORR. That was a proposition to raise the compensation to $1,500 a year. I now move to make it $1,200 a year.

Mr. HOLMAN. How does the gentleman get back to the paragraph relating to the Mackinac agency?

Mr. HORR. That was passed when I was called out by our clerk; while I was gone. I did not suppose that under the circumstances anybody would object to my moving an amendment to it.

The CHAIRMAN. No point of order was made on going back to the paragraph.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not object to it. I only want to give my reason for not voting for the amendment.

The remarkable feature about the matter is that these agencies are kept up at all; that is the remarkable feature, that they are kept up at all. My friend from Michigan must bear in mind that the very Indians who are to be under the supervision of these agents are legal voters in the State of Michigan; are they not?

Mr. HORR. A great many of them are.

Mr. HOLMAN. Are they not as a body legal voters?

Mr. HORR. Certainly they are.

Mr. HOLMAN. And here is the remarkable fact, that we are paying for an agent to look after a part of the voters—a part of the sovereign people of the State of Michigan. That is the remarkable fact.

Mr. HORR. Is that all you have to say?

Mr. HOLMAN. Not absolutely all, but I think that ought to be enough. [Laughter.] Is there any other class of my friend's constituents that he wants to have an agent to look after? Is there any other portion of the voters of the State of Michigan which he wants to have under the control and care of an agent?

My friend speaks of the bagatelle that is paid these agents, of the miserly salary of $100 a month. There are many people of the State of Michigan who do not get $100 a month, a great many of them. I have no doubt that to the great body of the people of Michigan, as well as of my own State, a salary of $100 a month would be a very handsome provision. I have no doubt that there are many laboring men in my friend's own district—I should not be surprised if there were many in his own town—who would regard half that salary as something far better than beggarly.

I admit that when you come to compare that amount with the amount of salaries paid by this Government to its employés it seems quite small. But when you compare that amount with the compensation which is received by men in the various employments of the country it certainly is not to be characterized as an insignificant sum.

But my main point of objection to the increase proposed here, and to the increase of any salary at all, is the fact which I have mentioned, that these Indians are a portion of the sovereign people of the State of Michigan, are voters in that State under the laws of the State, and so far as I am aware are quite intelligent men. I have no doubt my friend consults with them in regard to political affairs; I have no doubt of it. I have no doubt that he has gone into the region of country where they are to consult them about the public good. I should think that such persons would be able to look after themselves. If they are able to take part in the political affairs of the great mass of the people in the selection of those who are to control the affairs of a nation of 50,000,000 of people, and control and direct our legislation here, I think thay may be permitted to get along by themselves. I have not heard that they are asking for any agent there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. All that I have said about these Indians in Michigan is true, and more than true of the remnants of Indian tribes in New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate upon the pending amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. HORR. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of saying that I have been very much entertained by the remarks of my Indiana friend [Mr. HOLMAN] in reference to these Indians in my State.

The agent that has control of this matter lives in the district of my friend and colleague, Mr. ELDREDGE, who will say to you that although he differs from him in politics, the agent is an able lawyer, a man who is in every way calculated to look after the best interests of these Indians, and who devotes a large portion of his time to looking after their interests.

The fact that they are voters does not in any sense prevent their needing the care and attention of an agent. I want the House to understand distinctly that this amendment of mine is not an effort to raise the salary of these agents. This bill proposes to cut their compensation down from $100 a month, or $1,200 a year to $1,000 a year. My amendment simply proposes to place their compensation where it now is under the law.

I know that this conflicts with the Indiana idea of economy. I understand that. I recollect that during the last Presidential campaign, after Indiana had gone Republican, the New York World published a statement that one of Indiana's most distinguished Democrats, when he found how the election had gone, said he "felt awfully" about it—that actually he would not have had it happen for 25 cents. [Laughter.] Now, at that time I thought the New York World did injustice to the Indiana Democrat; but I had not then all the information I have to-day in regard to Indiana notions of economy.

This amendment of mine is simply in the interest of fair play toward these men who are doing this work. I believe members of this House will agree with me in this view. I hope my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment of my friend from Michigan. I had hardly thought it possible to drag in the general politics of this country upon this little item, and therefore I did not feel authorized to state what this agency is kept up for.

Mr. HORR. Go ahead; let us have it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I say that my friend from Michigan is more economical than the man in Indiana that he speaks about; for the Indiana man was willing to pay that quarter out of his own pocket, but my friend from Michigan, in order to keep up the political drifts to organize and arrange the political currents through this agency, is desirous to take this small sum of money from the public Treasury. That is the point of difference. [Laughter.] The Indiana man was willing to run political movements out of his own pocket; my friend wishes to do it out of the public purse. He stands right here in the presence of the representatives of 50,000,000 sovereign people and begs us for an additional $200 to give greater efficiency to his agent, that he may be the better able to move around through the southern portion of Michigan—through the pine woods and along the margin of that beautiful little island of Mackinac, quite famous in history—hunting up voters! [Laughter.]

Mr. BREWER, of New York. Mr. Chairman, the point that the gentleman from Indiana makes against the agency in Michigan will not hold good in reference to that in the State of New York. With us the Indians are not voters; they are the wards of the Government. They are scattered through the whole breadth of our State. The Indian agent has generally been located in Cattaraugus County, and he is obliged to go to Oneida, to Onondaga, to Saint Regis, and various other points remote from each other. He has to go to the tribes beyond Buffalo. His time is almost entirely occupied in the distribution of articles intended for the Indians and in protecting their interests. For a salary of $1,000 a suitable man to do this business can not be obtained. We have always had in this office either a professional lawyer or at any rate a man of good sound judgment who would be able to command in any business a salary of from $1,200 to $1,500. I thought that the good sense of this House would recognize the propriety of giving this agent at least the salary heretofore paid; it was my honest belief that he should have $1,500. But I acquiesce in the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] fixing this salary at $1,200, which I think this Committee of the Whole ought to be willing to grant.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HORR, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 56, noes 62.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, as there seems to be a distinction made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and some others between the agency in New York and that in Michigan, I move to amend so as to appropriate $1,200 for the salary of a New York agent.

In the State of New York the Indian tribes are scattered from Cattaraugus, on the Pennsylvania line, to Saint Regis, on the Canada line. In the intermediate region are the Tonawandas, the Senecas, the Cayugas, the Onondagas, and other tribes scattered at different points. For these various tribes a large amount of work is required to be done. Therefore a salary of $1,200, as proposed in my amendment, is none too much.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order that the proposition embraced in this amendment has already been voted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition originally voted upon was to insert $1,500. The present proposition is to insert $1,200——

Mr. HOLMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Michigan covered——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not refer to the motion of the gentleman from Michigan, but to the original proposition of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the gentleman from Michigan moved to increase both salaries to $1,200—that at the Mackinac agency and that at the New York agency. That proposition was voted down.

Mr. HORR. That was a joint proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion submitted by the gentleman from Michigan was to amend line 108 and also line 109—the two agencies being joined in one amendment. The proposition now offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] is a distinct amendment to line 109. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Upon the merits of this question, I will only say that these two agencies stand on the same footing. There is no reason why either should be kept up.

The question recurred on Mr. PARKER'S amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 68.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of five Indian inspectors, at $2,500 per annum each, $12,500.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I move to strike out the paragraph just read and in lieu thereof to insert the following, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of War shall detail five officers not under the grade of captain of the Army who shall act as Indian inspectors. Said officers may be changed at any time the Secretary of War may deem proper.

Mr. CANNON. I reserve the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. CANNON. My point of order is that it changes existing law and on its face does not appear to reduce expenses. It does not affect the amount of the bill. The whole question was up in the Forty-fourth Congress and fully considered when the proposition was made to transfer the Indian Bureau to the War Department.

Mr. EATON. I can not hear my friend from Illinois in the statement of his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order, as the pending question is an important one.

Mr. CANNON. I call the attention of the Chair that this is a proposition to detail Army officers to act as Indian inspectors under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. When the proposition was made to transfer the Indian Bureau from the Interior Department to the War Department in the Forty-fourth Congress, when Rule XXI was not nearly as stringent as it is now, the whole matter was discussed on a point of order at length, and the then Speaker of the House, the bill by agreement being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, held at that time that the proposition was not in order, and for the reason that it was a change of existing law and did not on its face retrench expenditure. He held further that under Rule XXI, with which I have no doubt the Chair is familiar, the proposition must necessarily retrench expenditures where it changes existing law, and that it must appear on its face affirmatively that it does retrench expenditure. I will ask that the third clause of Rule XXI be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill: Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

Mr. REAGAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. CANNON. I have no desire to state anything further on the point of order except to say that it will be admitted at once that it does change existing law and yet it does not retrench expenditure in either one of the three ways provided for by the third clause of the first rule, which has just been read by the Clerk.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. Does not the amendment reduce the number of officers, and does it not in that way retrench expenditure?

Mr. REAGAN. The amendment is clearly germane. It relates to the subject-matter of the bill, and does retrench expenditure.

Mr. CANNON. Allow me, before the gentleman proceeds, to finish my statement.

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to make my point of order complete by making an additional remark, so the gentleman from Texas can have it before him when he comes to address the committee on the subject.

The point of order goes to the whole amendment and to each provision of the amendment. There are two provisions in the amendment: one is to dispense with these Indian inspectors, and the other is to substitute Army officers. Particularly to the second provision of the amendment I make my point of order.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not see how the gentleman can rely on a distinction of that kind. The amendment is a substitute for the clause which provides for the appointment of necessary Indian inspectors by the Secretary of the Interior and the payment to them of $12,500. The amendment strikes out that appropriation of $12,500 and provides for officers who are salaried officers now under the Government, and it does on its face to that extent substantially save the Treasury to the amount stricken out. Therefore the amendment is not only germane to the subject-matter proposed to be stricken out, but it does clearly on its face reduce expenditure.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The ruling cited by the gentleman from Illinois was a ruling between two different systems, where it could not be shown which ultimately would be the cheaper, and consequently the amendment was ruled out. But this is a proposition to dispense with five Indian inspectors and authorize the Secretary of War to put in their places officers of the Army whose pay is already provided for by the Government. I can not see, therefore, how the point of order can possibly be maintained against it. It is not only in consonance with the rule, but in my judgment it is one of the very cases which the rule was made to cover.

Mr. HOLMAN. A single word, Mr. Chairman, upon the latter part of this proposition. The point of order is made upon two distinct propositions, namely, to strike out and to insert. The motion to strike out is clearly not subject to the point of order. It has never been held, sir, where a proposition would not of itself be in order, or is necessarily dependent upon a proposition that is in order, and where the two taken together constitute one proposition and retrench expenditures, that the point of order will lie against it.

Now, here the striking out and substituting instead of five inspectors a corresponding number of Army officers are propositions dependent upon each other, and together they reduce expenditures. The one is necessarily the result of the other. I submit, therefore, that there is no possible ground for the proposition that under the third clause of the twenty-first rule the proposition is not in order.

Mr. CANNON. An additional word upon that point.

I admit, sir, that the proposition to strike out the paragraph is in order. But that is a proposition that will stand alone. It is a substantive proposition. The other substantive proposition is to throw upon Army officers the burden of performing the service which is now performed by these inspectors. It is therefore a change of the law. It puts upon the shoulders of the Army officers burdens they do not now have to bear, and for the life of me I can not see how it can retrench expenditures. Certainly it does not retrench expenditures in any one of the three ways mentioned in this rule.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me make a suggestion to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. Very well.

Mr. HOLMAN. Suppose the proposition was to strike out these five inspectors and devolve the duties which now rest on them upon five other persons named in the bill. I ask, would not the two propositions taken together retrench expenditures? And would not the two taken together reduce the number of officers provided for by the bill?

Now, that is just what is proposed by this amendment. You strike out five persons whose salaries are covered by the bill and substitute five persons who are already employed by the Government. The Chair in ruling upon a point of order of this character must take official notice of the fact that the persons proposed to be employed on this service, in lieu of the five inspectors, are already in the employ and are paid by the Government.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the precedents are that the retrenchment of expenditures must appear affirmatively on the face of each proposition. Whenever you have to show retrenchment by argument or supposition that is a confession that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. REAGAN. Clause 7 of Rule XVI would seem to determine this proposition:

A motion to strike out and insert is indivisible.

It seems to me that that covers exactly this case. The two propositions can not be segregated; they must stand together; and hence the amendment is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I remember very well the position taken by Mr. Speaker Kerr and his ruling upon that subject. I think I myself made the point of order. It was on the Army bill, with reference to the transfer of the Indian Bureau.

How can there be a doubt of the fact that this retrenches expenditures? Twelve thousand five hundred dollars are carried by this provision which it is proposed to strike out. It is therefore a saving of expenditure to that extent.

Mr. CANNON. Does it say so on its face?

Mr. COX, of New York. Here also the duty is devolved upon officers who are already salaried by the Government. The subject needs no argumentation to show the saving of expenditure. The object of that rule, the old Rule 120, was to meet just such a case.

This does not change the law. It only gives to other gentlemen or agencies the power to execute the same law. Therefore the point of order is not well taken. The Army officers are the other agents; the law remains the same; and we save $12,500 of expenditure on the part of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair agrees with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that the proposed amendment must not only retrench expenditures, but that the retrenchment of expenditures must be apparent on its face.

Now, the proposition of the gentleman from Texas, if adopted, would obviously strike from the proposed bill the provision appropriating $12,500. The Chair cannot do otherwise than hold that it would, to that extent, fall within the third class, covered by the third clause of Rule XXI—that is, a reduction of the amount of money covered by the bill.

The Chair wishes to say, though, in this connection, that he is not familiar with the precedent to which the gentleman refers as having occurred some years ago, in which Mr. Speaker Kerr, it seems, ruled in conformity with the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois with reference to a proposition which was then pending. The Chair, however, is under the impression that that proposition involved a change or substitution of systems in reference to the Indian policy, and the Chair can understand how such a proposition would not fall within this rule.

This, however, is a different proposition, and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Temporarily, if not permanently, I wish to appeal from the decision of the Chair, so as to get the opinion of the Chair upon another branch of the point of order that seems to have escaped the attention of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain the appeal.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to have the amendment read again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. CANNON. Now, sir, there are two propositions in this amendment. The Chair has ruled upon the point that the first proposition, to strike out lines 122, 123, and 124, is in order. But I do not understand the Chair to have ruled upon the other proposition in the amendment. And I would be glad, if I am in order, to call the attention of the Chair to the precedents that make it competent in Committee of the Whole to make a point of order not only to an amendment, but to each provision in an amendment under this clause of the rule:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto, changing existing law, be in order except such, as being germane, &c.

Now, this second provision of the amendment, which throws on the Army officers a duty that they now do not perform by law, does change existing law, because it is a duty nowhere provided for in the statutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is conceded that it does change existing law. There is no controversy about that. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit the Chair to submit to him this question? Suppose the amendment of the gentleman from Texas were adopted; that would strike out lines 122, 123, and 124; would not the agreeing to that amendment reduce the appropriations of the bill to the extent of $12,500?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly. But, may it please the Chair, while there is no doubt that portion of the amendment is in order, the point of order runs to the other provision. There are two propositions in the amendment, and the point of order applies to the second provision, separating it from the first. That point of order, if I can get the favorable ruling of the Chair, will absolutely exclude that portion of the amendment which devolves this duty upon the Army officers.

This is not a new question. It is a question that has been determined time and again in Committee of the Whole. It has been determined, I say, that it is competent to make the point of order on each substantive provision of an amendment, and if that provision be subject to the point of order the Chair sustains it so far as that provision is concerned and the amendment stands as to the other provisions.

I had no notice that this amendment was to be offered; otherwise I should have been prepared with the precedents. I have however the original decision made by Mr. Speaker Kerr. I will send it up to the desk and ask the permission of the Chair that it may be read as marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Chair has heard with great pleasure the suggestions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania; he appreciates their force and is most willing to say that they contribute in great part to the embarrassment the Chair feels in reaching a conclusion on this subject. But the Chair must take official notice of the fact that in this bill no appropriation is made for the Army or for the performance of any of its duties in any of its several bureaus or departments; and the Chair must further officially know that in the ordinary course of legislative proceedings such an appropriation bill must be introduced and enacted before the session expires as of necessity will embrace the further and more complete regulation of this entire subject. Now the Chair can not look forward into that legislation and say upon anything that appears on the face of this section that such legislation will in all respects coincide with, sustain, or affirm the provisions of this section and carry out the proposed retrenchment indicated in it. In other words, the Chair desires to be distinctly understood that the point upon which his decision in this case turns is that from the face of the section it does not appear that the provision comes within the requirement of this rule, which is that it shall be germane to the subject-matter of the bill and "shall retrench expenditures." It does not affirmatively appear upon the face of the bill or the laws of the land or the usual and customary mode of proceeding of this body that this section, if enacted in this bill, will retrench expenditures.

In the judgment of the Chair this rule should have a liberal construction in the interests of retrenchment. The purpose of the rule is the most beneficent and proper, and the Chair under any circumstances not attended with extreme doubt would hold it to be his duty to enforce the rule.

The Chair would be further disposed, acting upon a principle of law, to assume prima facie that the judgment of the House in its construction of this rule should be adopted by the Chair where that judgment had been reached after discussion and consideration. But here there is such a novel presentation of the proposition to retrench, having relation to matters to be done in the future, being in itself essentially incomplete, that the Chair does not feel at liberty to decide that the section is in order; and he therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to say that that decision was upon a proposition to transfer the Indian Bureau from the Department of the Interior to the control of the Secretary of War? It was a proposition involving the transfer of the whole bureau.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; but the greater includes the less. This is a proposition to devolve upon the Army certain duties touching the Indians which, under existing law, it does not have to perform, namely, the performance by five Army officers of the duties of Indian inspectors under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

I have asked the Journal Clerk to find the precedents made during the last Congress and the one before, but I have not yet received them, in which it was held that it was in order to make the point of order on each and every provision of an amendment. I would not have sought to contend with the Chair in reference to this matter if I had understood the Chair to rule upon the second provision of this amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. There is no doubt a point of order can be made to each separate provision of an amendment when there are separate provisions; but in this case there are two propositions, which, under the rule, can not be separated.

Mr. COX, of New York. I have listened to the reading of the decision of Mr. Speaker Kerr, and it all comes back to me plainly. The proposition on which that rule was made was to give the Army charge of Indian affairs and transfer the Indian Bureau from the Interior Department to the War Department. We had had that for a week under debate. It was a very complicated question. No one could unravel it so as to say whether or not there was economy in the proposition. For one I argued against it. I thought and believed then it was not economical to give the control of that bureau to the Army. The Speaker says in effect in his decision the matter is so incomplete, so nebulous, so indefinite, he can not say whether or not the proposition reduces expenditure. But who doubts as to this present motion? It appears on the face of it that it does cut down expenses. All it does is simply to say, "You, sir, of the Army, now drawing a salary payable by the Government, shall act in this particular capacity and not in another." The law remains the same; the mode of inspection remains the same; all is the same except that the Army officer does the work instead of the other man.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to suggest as to the point of order that a certain number of agents is provided for in this bill. Suppose the motion was to strike out five inspectors and substitute five of the agents provided for by this bill and devolve upon them the additional duty; will any one say that that does not reduce the number of officers?

Another point: The opinion which has been read expressly mentions the fact, and repeats it time and time again, although it is a short opinion, that certain facts shall be taken notice of officially. The Chair takes notice of the fact officially, as the presiding officer of this Committee of the Whole, that the Army officers designated here are officers of this Federal Government who perform certain duties; and this proposed amendment devolves additional duties upon them; that and nothing more.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee rose informally, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, his Secretary.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session, and proceeded with the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not desire to enter into a discussion of this question, but simply to make a suggestion with reference to the effect of the proposed amendment, which suggestion, as I understand, has not been made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] or by any other gentleman.

It is assumed that so much of the proposed amendment as would strike out lines 122, 123, and 124 of the printed bill would of itself operate to reduce expenditures. That can not possibly be in the present condition of our legislation. These five inspectors are provided for by law, and they would continue to hold their offices and be entitled to draw their pay the same whether this clause is in or out of this bill. It is true that the bill might be passed without making any provision for the payment of the salaries of these five inspectors; but they would be entitled to those salaries, and by all rules and precedents we would be bound to make an appropriation to pay them in a deficiency bill.

Mr. EATON. The gentleman says that these officers are provided for by law. Is not that the very thing we are now proposing to do, to pass a law on the subject?

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] is quite intelligent enough to understand that where an office is created by law, and the salary of that office is fixed, and a man is put into the office, it becomes the duty of the Congress of the United States to provide the means for paying him his salary. These five inspectors are appointed by the President of the United States in pursuance of law; they are now holding their offices, and will continue to hold them, even though this clause should be stricken out of the bill, and they will continue to be entitled to draw their salaries the same as if this clause should be left in the bill. This is merely an appropriation clause in an Indian appropriation bill, and striking it out would not have any effect to reduce expenditures.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] and myself have perfected an amendment which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] whether or not, taking his view of the case, this amendment would not still fall within the third of the methods by which expenditures may be retrenched?

Mr. KEIFER. I have not the rule before me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman to the provisions of the rule. There are three ways by which expenditures may be retrenched: one, by a reduction of the number and salary of officers of the United States; the second method of reduction is by reducing the compensation to be paid to any person out of the Treasury; and the third means of retrenching expenditures is "by the reduction of the amounts of money covered by the bill." Does not this amendment unquestionably reduce the amount of money covered by this bill?

Mr. KEIFER. Undoubtedly it comes within that provision of the rule. But the amendment proposes to change existing law, notwithstanding that.

The CHAIRMAN. That is conceded.

Mr. KEIFER. It does not follow that there is anything in the mere proposition to change existing law which would bring the amendment within any one of these special provisions.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not within the provision reducing the amount of money covered by the bill?

Mr. KEIFER. When I started to argue this question it was upon the theory advanced by the Chair, as I understood, that the proposed amendment would operate to reduce expenditures. It is now suggested that the amendment would still be in order because it proposes to reduce the amount covered by the bill; and if it stood entirely alone upon that ground the Chair would be right in holding the amendment in order.

But there is a proposition to change existing law, which proposed change in and of itself does not reduce expenditures and does not operate to affect the amount involved in the bill. It must be borne in mind that whenever there is anything objectionable in a proposed amendment the whole amendment falls. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is right that the proposition to strike out and insert is indivisible, and there is anything objectionable in what it is proposed to insert, then the point of order holds good against the entire proposition. We all agree to that.

But this discussion may be entirely unnecessary, as the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] suggests that he has changed the amendment entirely, which he has a right to do.

The CHAIRMAN. This discussion has been going on on an appeal from a ruling of the Chair, and that appeal must be disposed of.

Mr. KEIFER. If the amendment is withdrawn I presume the appeal will be withdrawn also.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] proposes to withdraw his amendment and substitute another, which he has a right to do, then I am willing to withdraw my appeal from the ruling of the Chair, because it would fall with the amendment to which it relates, and then let the question come up on the changed amendment.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I ask the Clerk to read the amendment which I now send up.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 122, 123, and 124, and insert in lieu thereof the following:
"The office of Indian inspector is hereby abolished, and the Secretary of War shall detail five officers of the Army, not under the grade of captain, who shall act, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, as Indian inspectors; and the Secretary of War shall change such officers at any time the Secretary of the Interior shall request the same to be done."

Mr. CANNON. I make a point of order on that amendment. That part of it which provides that the office of Indian inspector shall hereby be abolished of course is not subject to a point of order. The remainder of the proposition, constituting a substantive proposition to detail five Army officers to perform certain duties, is a change of existing law and does not upon its face retrench expenditures. I again call the attention of the Chair to the language of the rule:

Nor shall any provision in such bill or amendment thereof changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

This proposition does not appear upon its face to retrench expenditures in any of the three ways indicated by the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to decide this question. With reference to the precedent which has been cited here—a ruling made by Mr. Kerr when Speaker of the House—the Chair, as already indicated, sees a very broad distinction between the case upon which that decision was made and the one now presented. Of course, if that decision were applicable to this case, the present occupant of the Chair would simply bow respectfully to its authority and follow it. But for the reasons which have been stated, it could not appear upon the face of that amendment, which proposed to transfer the whole machinery of the Indian service from the Interior to the War Department, that expenditures were retrenched in one of the three ways provided for in the rule. Hence the application of that decision to the present case the Chair is unable to see.

Now, recurring to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], the Chair desires to say it is clearly admitted that this amendment does change existing law. That being conceded, the next question to be determined is whether it retrenches expenditures. And the retrenchment must be in one of the three ways indicated in the rule. It must either reduce the number or salary of officers of the United States, or it must reduce the compensation of some person paid out of the Treasury, or it must reduce amounts of money covered by the bill. The Chair holds that this amendment does reduce the appropriations made in this particular bill.

With reference to the point last suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], as to the divisibility of this motion to strike out and insert, the Chair will direct the Clerk to read from clause 7 of Rule XVI.

The Clerk read as follows:

A motion to strike out and insert is indivisible.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that this proposition of the gentleman from Texas must for the purposes of this point of order be considered as a whole; it is not divisible. The Chair, therefore, rules that the point made by the gentleman from Illinois is not well taken. The question is now on the appeal of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Upon that appeal I desire to be heard by the committee for a moment.

Mr. Chairman, the policy of the House of Representatives has been to discourage general legislation upon appropriation bills. Such legislation is not in order on bills of this character, except under certain conditions, specially provided for by the rule.

This policy is most wise. The appropriation bills must pass, and now if we legislate upon these bills to any great extent they will not only appropriate the money but also drag through much crude and unwise legislation.

Members of the House in the aggregate have always been jealous of the tendency on the part of the Committee on Appropriations to control not only the appropriations but largely the whole business of the House; yet individual members of the House are anxious to tack their pet schemes for legislation to these bills for the reason they know they must pass.

It is the duty of the Committee of the Whole and the House to see to it that no legislation is ingrafted upon these bills except such as comes strictly within the rule.

If the committee will bear with me for a moment, I will trace very briefly the history of the rule upon this subject. From 1838 to the close of the Forty-third Congress, in 1875, the rule was as follows—I read from Barclay's Digest, page 192:

120. No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress and for the contingencies of carrying on the several Departments of the Government.

Under this rule it was held that an amendment was in order increasing the salaries of public officials, but was not in order decreasing such salaries.

In the Forty-fourth Congress, first session, January 17, 1876 (see Smith's Digest, page 130), Rule 120 was amended by striking out the words:

And for the contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government.

And inserting in their place the following words:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

Under the operation of this rule as amended the Committee on Appropriations absorbed almost the whole business of the House. The appropriation bills covered not only the money but nearly all the legislation; the other committees of the House became mere ornamental dress-parade organs of the House, and the members of the House not on the Appropriations Committee were of but little use except to vote. The attention of the country was attracted to the operation of this rule, and while much valuable legislation was had under it, the demand of almost all members of all parties was that it should be so modified as to further restrict the power of the Committee on Appropriations and of legislation on appropriation bills.

When the present rules were revised it was provided in the third clause of Rule XXI as follows:

Nor shall any provision in any such [appropriation] bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures [1] by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, [2] by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, [3] or by the reduction of the amount of money covered by the bill.

Now, I submit that the committee should see to it that this rule as finally modified should not be frittered away by unwise or strained constructions. The object the House had in view by the final amendment to this rule was to cut up by the root all legislation upon appropriation bills except for the special objects and in the manner specified.

This matter was very fully argued in the last Congress, when Mr. Robinson, of Massachusetts, now governor of that State, presided as chairman of the Committee of the Whole. I regret that since this amendment was offered I have not had time to examine the arguments which were made at that time, and the ruling of the Chair upon the question. But I recollect them very well, especially for the reason that I then had charge of the legislative appropriation bill, and amendments raising this question came in all along the line. Time and again where the proposition was to strike out and insert, and the matter to be inserted involved two or more substantive propositions, points of order were made and sustained as to some propositions in amendments, and overruled as to others.

Now, let us see what would be the effect of the ruling of the Chair? It is proposed to repeal the law providing for five Indian inspectors. That is in order—why? Because it decreases expenditures by reducing the number of office-holders. But it goes a step further and provides—this is the second substantive proposition of the amendment—that five Army officers shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, do this work. Now if you can provide in this way upon a general appropriation bill for detailing five Army officers, you may detail five hundred Army officers. If you can change the law in this way to make a detail of five Army officers, you can by a different proposition authorize the use of the Army to run the whole Indian service, withdrawing these military officers to that extent from the duties now assigned them by law.

Well, sir, some one says has not Congress the right to do that? Certainly it has, provided the Senate and the House concur; but this House is proceeding under its rules. What are its rules? That appropriations shall be made under existing laws. I have stood here Congress after Congress and have heard maledictions rained down upon the Appropriations Committee from the very beginning because that committee had absorbed nearly all the business of Congress. How? By making appropriations and changing the laws. Therefore this rule was wisely made to circumscribe the power of that committee. How? By prohibiting them from legislating upon an appropriation bill except when it should retrench expenditure. And even further than that, except when it retrenched expenditure in one of three ways. What are they? It must be germane and it must retrench expenditure by reduction in the number and salary of officers of the United States. Does this amendment so retrench expenditure?

Mr. MAGINNIS. It does to the extent of these five Indian inspectors.

Mr. CANNON. I have talked in vain if I have failed to make my friend understand that my point of order runs to the second provision and not to the first. If the proposition stood alone providing for a repeal of the law authorizing these five Indian inspectors, I would have no objection to it so far as this point of order is concerned. But there is a second provision to which I have objection. And wherein does that second provision come within the rule? Does it reduce the number or salary of officers of the United States? No. Does it reduce the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury? No. Does it reduce the amount covered by the bill? No; and that is admitted by the Chair in his decision.

But the Chair holds that a motion to strike out and insert is not divisible under another rule. I will not stop to discuss that question, because for the purpose of this discussion it may be admitted to be the rule generally. But what are you going to do with the provisions of Rule XXI, "Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order," &c.?

Mr. EATON. Read the exceptions.

Mr. CANNON. I have already spoken of that. The ruling of the Chair nullifies this clause of Rule XXI, while the universal rule of construction is that where two rules conflict that construction should be given that will allow both to operate. If I stood alone, Mr. Chairman, if this were a new question, it might have a tendency to weaken my conviction about it. But it is not a new question; it has been decided again and again. Mr. Robinson, of Massachusetts, decided that Rule XXI changed the other rule referred to by the Chair in this one instance, namely, that where the question arises on an appropriation bill the point of order can be taken not only on the whole amendment but on each provision of it.

Some one may say that I place too much stress on this ruling. So far as this particular amendment is concerned, I should not have consumed the time of the committee beyond a moment. If it were not that this decision nullifies Rule XXI, setting aside previous decisions and precedents, and making in order the putting upon appropriation bills every species of legislation, provided only it shall by one provision be germane and retrench expenditures, while every other provision may have the effect to increase expenditures and not be germane. It is to prevent this absurdity, this sacrifice of the substance to the shadow, that I take an appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

I hope the committee will fully understand the importance of this point of order and see where we are drifting before we sustain the Chair in a ruling that I am satisfied he would not have made had there been time to furnish the precedents and call his attention to what the practice of the committee has been heretofore.

Mr. REED was recognized.

Mr. HAMMOND addressed the Chair.

Mr. REED. Does the gentleman from Georgia desire to be heard in opposition to the point of order? If so, I will yield to him.

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise for the purpose, as I believe the committee is in full possession of all the facts that it requires to come to a proper understanding of this subject—to make a motion, if it be admissible, to lay the appeal on the table.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that that would not be in order in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. REED. I would like to hear the views of the gentleman from Georgia, as this is an important matter.

Mr. HAMMOND. It is not my wish to add anything to what has been said upon the point of order. I only desire in some way to cut off this discussion and proceed with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, the very great importance of this matter is the only excuse I have for participating in or prolonging the debate upon it, and I desire to address what I have to say to the Chair mainly, for the Chair must recognize the great difficulty that the committee has, and the disadvantage at which it is placed in attempting to overrule a decision of the Chair. It is rather unusual for the committee to do so, and therefore a great many gentlemen would hesitate to vote for it. But the very great importance of this matter makes me desirous of urging upon the consideration of the Chair the propriety of giving the subject a special and further examination.

The decision which has already been urged applies to a rule which does not exist now. The rule which exists now was intended to confine the Committee of the Whole to propositions, and to propositions alone, which retrench expenditures in the ways that have been so repeatedly specified here to-day. It was not intended that a proposition which reduces expenditures should serve as a means for dragging along propositions totally disconnected from it, and which did not in themselves reduce expenditures. Otherwise the Chair will see that in order to change the whole existing law on any subject in an appropriation bill all that is necessary will be to have an introductory sentence which would reduce expenditures and append to it anything you choose.

Now, this rule was intended to cut off any such extravagant powers on the part of the Committee on Appropriations and of the Committee of the Whole when acting upon appropriation bills. Consequently, the rule hitherto has been interpreted in such way that if the proposition or if the proposed amendment in addition to a proposition which reduced expenditures contains other propositions which do not retrench expenditures, it vitiates the whole amendment, and it must be rejected or excluded from the bill. That is perfectly clear as the meaning of this rule.

Just consider for a moment the result of overturning the salutary decision of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Robinson] now the governor of that State. Its effect would be to allow every amendment to be made upon an appropriation bill which human imagination can conceive of, provided you prefix to it a sentence which, standing by itself, reduces expenditures or the amount of money covered by the bill, or in any one of the three ways specified in the rule.

I call the attention of the Chair to the language of this rule again:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment—

Now take out the unnecessary words—

Nor shall any provision in any * * * amendment thereto, changing existing law, be in order, &c.

That recognizes distinctly the fact that there may be an amendment, like that which is now presented, which is composed of different and distinct propositions. Now, the rule says "any provision in any amendment," and if the amendment consists of three provisions any one of which is open to the point of order, all of them are obnoxious to it, and must be ruled out. In other words, the bad provision vitiates the admissibility of the whole amendment under this rule. In that sense and in that construction it is plain that it is a wise and a sensible rule. But any exception to it, or any extension of the rule which enables one good proposition to carry with it two bad ones into the bill, is something which the House ought not to permit itself to concur in now or to establish as a precedent for the future.

I do not know, sir, that I can add to the force of what I have said, if I have been fortunate enough to make myself understood. I want to warn the House against the result of such decisions whereby you render nugatory and worthless all the salutary restrictions which our rules impose; and I sincerely hope that the Chair, in the light of this discussion, may see fit to reconsider and change his opinion upon the subject, and permit this rule as it has hitherto stood to prevail in this House.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SPRINGER took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. HISCOCK. In discussing this point of order I desire to ask this question of the Chair and the committee: Suppose the amendment offered was merely the second proposition of it:

The Secretary of War shall detail five officers of the Army, not under the grade of captain, who shall act, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, as Indian inspectors, and the Secretary of War shall change said officers at any time the Secretary of the Interior shall request the same to be done.

Now, the question that I submit to you, Mr. Chairman and the committee, is this: Suppose that amendment was offered to this bill, would you hold it in order? You would promptly say, sir, it was not germane, and you would rule it out of order on that ground. You would say it was an attempt upon this Indian appropriation bill to change the law with reference to the Army, to impose new duties upon Army officers. You would say that under our rules a provision of that kind was not germane to this bill at all; and upon that single question of whether it was germane or not you would rule it out.

Supposing, Mr. Chairman, to illustrate the point further—suppose upon this bill was offered a provision to transfer the duties now devolving upon the Commissioner of Agriculture to some other officer, to take them away from the Commissioner of Agriculture and impose upon that other officer the discharge of those duties; you would promptly rule such a proposition out of order again, I say, upon the ground that it was not germane. Now, the proposition which I submit to you is this: whether by striking out of a bill an appropriation for an officer or for the payment of an agent you can attach to that a proposition to repeal any statute you please—that is what is here contended for—to legislate as you please and hold that to be in order simply because a motion to strike out and insert is indivisible. That is the proposition which I submit to you and which I submit to the committee. If you are right in your decision—and I desire to impress this view upon the committee—if you are right in the decision, then it would be competent at any time to move to strike from a bill an appropriation to pay a particular officer, and in connection with that to change the Revised Statutes as you choose.

If you can insert a provision of that kind in an appropriation bill you can transfer the whole Indian Bureau to the War Department by an amendment of this kind. A gentleman on the other side shakes his head. I think there can be no doubt about it. If this rule can be invoked that a proposition to strike out and insert is always indivisible, then I say if the motion to strike out is germane and proper, there is no limitation upon the affirmative legislation that you can incorporate in an appropriation bill. The point, therefore, that I make is that you must inquire whether the provision which is sought to be inserted is germane; whether that would be proper upon the bill standing by itself, standing alone. The rule which has been read here simply means that you may strike out and insert substance which is germane, which properly can go upon the bill. It means that, and means nothing else.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. May I ask the gentleman from New York a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly; I yield for a question, because I regard this as the most important point that has ever been submitted under these rules of the House.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. A motion to strike out and insert by way of an amendment the gentleman admits is indivisible?

Mr. HISCOCK. I certainly would admit such a motion is indivisible.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Now, then, what is the amendment upon which the Chair determines whether it is germane or not? Is it not the whole proposition to strike out and insert?

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, no, sir. The gentleman has failed to appreciate or understand my argument. It is this, that if an amendment so far as it strikes out is germane and proper, you can not by a motion to strike out and insert bring into the bill that which is improper and not germane. That is my proposition. And I shall ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], who I observe is about to rise, and for whose judgment I have the greatest respect, and who I believe will try to discuss this question as a lawyer and from a non-partisan standpoint—I shall ask him when he comes to reply to me to tell me if under this decision it is not possible to repeal the Revised Statutes; if it is not possible to transfer the whole Indian Bureau over to the War Department; if there is no limitation upon the legislation which can be accomplished upon an appropriation bill under the decision made by the Chair. The point—and I desire to impress it upon the chairman and the committee—the point I make is that the substance which you would insert in the bill under the motion to strike out and insert must be germane to the bill, and must be germane to the pending provision of the bill, something which is pertinent, to do something which, if I may use the expression, properly betters the provision of the bill—new language which is more apt in its phraseology, which more clearly expresses and defines the purport, something which bears upon the same question. That is what is contemplated shall be offered and put in the place of that which is taken from the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I am reluctant to detain the Committee of the Whole by any further discussion of the point of order, and would not do so but for the purpose of calling attention to what seems to me to be the error of the argument presented by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] and by some of the gentlemen who have preceded him. The substance of his argument is that if by striking out a clause of a bill, thereby reducing the number of officers provided for, something can be inserted in lieu of it not germane to the bill, then we might proceed on an appropriation bill to repeal the whole of the Revised Statutes. If you will allow the truth of his premises, then his conclusion is correct. But that is not what we are talking about.

The decision of the Chair is undoubtedly correct under the rules unless the gentleman can show that the pending proposition is divisible. To determine that question and to determine the one which the gentleman from New York has discussed, allow me to say that the pending motion is to strike out the provision of the bill which authorizes the employment of five persons from civil life to act as Indian inspectors, and to insert in lieu of it a provision that officers of the Army may be detailed to perform the service which the five Indian inspectors would perform should the original provision of the bill be allowed to stand. I submit that that statement shows that the proposition to strike out and insert is altogether germane to the object of the bill, and the second clause of the proposition is germane to the first.

Mr. HISCOCK. Now, right here, because, of course, we are trying to get at the truth of the matter, at what is just and right, I ask the gentleman from Texas if the proposition to insert which is involved in this amendment would be germane to the bill if offered alone?

Mr. REAGAN. I may admit, and I do admit, that it would not be.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is all that I ask.

Mr. REAGAN. But it is not alone, and, therefore, the premise of the gentleman does not meet the case. The proposition to insert must be taken in connection with the motion to strike out. The object of the bill is to make an appropriation in order to secure inspection of the Indians by means of five inspectors appointed from civil life. The amendment reduces expenditures proposed by the bill by the sum of $12,500, and secures the inspection contemplated by means of officers of the Army. The inspection of the Indians being the object to be attained by the law, the mode of securing that inspection is secured by the proposed amendment. That is all I think it is necessary to say on the subject.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to supplement the question which I asked the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] by another. I would ask the gentleman if the test as to whether matter shall be introduced into the bill is not whether it is germane?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is the test.

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly; it must be germane.

Mr. HISCOCK. If you do not make that the test, then I ask if there is any limitation upon the substantive matter which can be placed in a bill in connection with a proposition to strike out?

Mr. REAGAN. I know the gentleman has already presented that view of the case.

Mr. HISCOCK. I want to follow it to its legitimate consequences. If you do not make the test whether it is germane or not as an independent proposition, then can you not put in an appropriation bill by that method a provision to repeal the Revised Statutes?

Mr. REAGAN. I repeat that that question is not before the committee. The committee has before it the amendment which has been proposed, and I do not propose to take up a case which is not before the committee and discuss it for the purpose of determining the question which is before the committee.

It is sufficient to say that the object of the clause which is now in the bill is to secure an inspection of Indians by officers appointed from civil life at an expense of $12,500. That inspection is secured by the proposed amendment, and the $12,500 is saved to the Treasury; the amount of money covered by the bill is reduced to that extent.

I do not deem it necessary to discuss the proposition that we can attach to the striking out of a provision in the bill the insertion of something that is not germane to the bill. I do not of course argue the question whether we can repeal the whole of the Revised Statutes—an illustration which has been made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] two or three times—on the motion to strike out something that will reduce expenditures. That is not the question before the committee. All that I propose to insist upon is that by this amendment we will reduce expenditures, and at the same time secure the service sought; and the whole proposition is germane to the original paragraph of the bill.

Mr. CHACE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas one question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG].

Mr. LONG. I rise to make an inquiry of the Chair in order to understand fully the ruling which he has made. Do I understand the Chair to say that, admitting all that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has said, yet, in view of the fact that this is a motion to strike out and insert, which motion is indivisible, therefore the whole proposition is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. In response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], the Chair begs to state that his decision was made before the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] threw out his suggestion; but he has not discovered anything in that suggestion which leads him to change the ruling he had already made. The ruling of the Chair is simply that the amendment in question provides that five Army officers shall be detailed to perform certain duties, instead of five civilians, and that that amendment is an entirety and not obnoxious to the point of order urged against it.

Mr. LONG. I understand the motion is to strike out, which is one thing, and also to insert a provision, which consists of two substantive propositions.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not the amendment; that is, to insert two substantive propositions.

Mr. LONG. I ask that the amendment may be again read.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the Clerk will again read the amendment.

The Clerk again read the amendment, as follows:

Strike out lines 122, 123 and 124, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The office of Indian inspector is hereby abolished, and the Secretary of War shall detail five officers of the Army, not under the grade of captain, who shall act, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, as Indian inspectors; and the Secretary of War shall change such officers at any time the Secretary of the Interior shall request the same to be done."

The CHAIRMAN. Now, if the gentleman from Massachusetts will hear one further suggestion, the divisibility of this pending amendment does not consist in the fact that the matter proposed to be substituted contains two different substantive propositions which ought to be divided, but lies in the fact that the proposition is to strike out and insert.

Mr. LONG. This is exactly what I wanted to ascertain. Now, if I understand this case, here is, first, a motion to strike out, then a motion to insert; and the motion to insert covers two distinctive propositions, the first of which is to abolish the Indian inspectors, and the second to confer certain powers upon the Secretary of War. Now, I understand the Chair to admit that while the first of these distinctive propositions does reduce expenditures, the second, if standing alone, would change existing law without reducing expenditures. Therefore this motion to insert, if it were not coupled with a motion to strike out, would contain a proposition changing existing law but not reducing expenses, and the result would be that the whole thing would be ruled out.

But the Chair says that this motion to insert is coupled with a motion to strike out, and he refers us to clause 7 of Rule XVI, which says that a motion to strike out and insert is indivisible. But what does the word "indivisible" mean as used in this rule? Not indivisible in every sense; not indivisible against the world. We all know that the word "indivisible" as used in this connection means simply indivisible so far as putting the motion is concerned; that is, as regards the mere parliamentary putting of the question you can not separate the motion to strike out from the motion to insert. That is the entire extent and scope of the word "indivisible" as there used.

But when, passing from this rule, which refers to "motions and their precedents," you come to the subject of the bills and amendments of bills changing existing law, then you approach an entirely new topic, and you come under a substantive rule which declares that if any provision in a bill or amendment is obnoxious to the rule the whole proposition shall be excluded. It seems to me the Chair is carrying too far the force of the word "indivisible," which by all parliamentary precedents is limited to the mere question of putting the motion. But under Rule XXI, the construction of which, together with the reasons for its adoption and the precedents, has been stated by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], if any provision in a proposed amendment changes existing law and does not reduce expenses the whole amendment is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the Committee of the Whole is on the appeal of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. SPRINGER. May I be heard on that question?

The CHAIRMAN. Inasmuch as the Chair has permitted this debate to run along without any limitation whatever upon gentlemen who have desired to speak, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. Some reference has been made to the decision of Mr. Speaker Kerr in the Forty-fourth Congress upon a proposition somewhat similar to this. At that time, during the pendency of the bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government, a motion was made to add a section transferring the Indian Bureau from the Interior Department to the War Department. Mr. Speaker Kerr held the amendment not in order under the rule.

The present question is to be considered in connection with the provision now contained in our rule that an amendment coming from an individual and not from a committee must retrench expenditures in one of three designated methods, one of which is "by the reduction of the number and salary of officers of the United States."

The present amendment does propose to abolish certain offices. It contemplates the discontinuance of five Indian inspectors and the transfer of their duties to Army officers already receiving pay for their services under the appropriations for the Army.

Now, the question arises upon this amendment whether the proposition retrenches expenditures. It does retrench expenditures; it will stop the payment of five Indian inspectors and confer their duties upon Army officers now receiving pay as such, and who will not have additional pay on account of this additional duty.

Mr. VALENTINE. Under this rule, is not the first test whether any or all of the provisions in the amendment are germane? Is not that the first question rather than the question of retrenchment? "Being germane" is the language of the rule.

Mr. SPRINGER. I did not know that any question had been raised as to whether this amendment was germane or not.

Mr. VALENTINE. That is the only question—whether it is germane upon this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] will give way, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WELLBORN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6092) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RECEPTION OF GENERAL GRANT.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, we have the honor of having with us on the floor to-day General Grant. There are no words necessary to an American in so far as he is concerned; but we will do ourselves honor by taking a recess for fifteen minutes and give members an opportunity to shake him by the hand. [Applause.] I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to take a recess for fifteen minutes for the purpose of receiving our distinguished fellow-citizen, General Grant.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. Unanimously.

The SPEAKER. Yes; unanimously.

The House (at 4 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) took a recess; and Mr. Speaker CARLISLE and Mr. RANDALL escorted General Grant to the area in front of the Official Reporter's desk, where he was presented to the several Members and Delegates. He was greeted with applause when he came down the main aisle, and also when he left the House.

At 4 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m. the recess expired, and the House resumed its session.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, requested the return of joint resolution (H. Res. 210) requiring the Secretary of War to furnish copies of certain muster-rolls to the governor of the State of Ohio, yesterday passed by the Senate without amendment.

It further announced the passage of the following bills; in which concurrence was requested, namely:

A bill (S. 1037) for the relief of John P. Walworth;

A bill (S. 953) for the relief of H. B. Wilson, administrator of the estate of William Tinder, deceased;

A bill (S. 1459) relating to the improvement of coinage;

A bill (S. 873) for the relief of William G. Ford, of Memphis, Tenn.;

A bill (S. 835) to amend section 1000 of the Revised Statutes, in relation to giving security in cases on appeal or writ of error;

A bill (S. 554) to promote the efficiency of the General Land Office; and

A bill (S. 458) for the relief of William H. Crook.

RETURN OF JOINT RESOLUTION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, April 2, 1884.

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the joint resolution of the House requiring the Secretary of War to furnish copies of certain muster-rolls to the governor of the State of Ohio, yesterday passed by the Senate without amendment.

There was no objection, and the request of the Senate was agreed to.

IMPRISONMENT OF AMERICAN CITIZENS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message of the President; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

In response to the resolution of the House of Representatives, of 5th of February last, respecting the arrest and imprisonment of certain American citizens by the authorities of Colombia, at Aspinwall, I transmit a report of the Secretary of State.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 2, 1884.

PROTECTION OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER LEVEES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House the following message of the President; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress a communication from the Secretary of War, embodying the views of the president of the Mississippi River Commission upon a report from Major Stickney, of the Engineer Corps, in relation to the protection of existing levees from destruction by the floods in the lower part of the Mississippi River. It appears that there is an urgent need of an appropriation of $100,000 to be used for this purpose, and that an enormous destruction of property may be thereby averted.

I recommend an immediate appropriation of the sum required for the purpose, to be expended under the direction of the Mississippi River Commission.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 2, 1884.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LAMB, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for one week, on account of important business.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to print remarks on the bill granting a pension to Septimia R. Meikleham, sole surviving grandchild of Thomas Jefferson.

And then, on motion of Mr. BUCKNER (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 3, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER LEVEES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress a communication from the Secretary of War, embodying the views of the president of the Mississippi River Commission upon a report from Major Stickney, of the Engineer Corps, in relation to the protection of existing levees from destruction by the floods in the lower part of the Mississippi River. It appears that there is an urgent need of an appropriation of $100,000 to be used for this purpose, and that an enormous destruction of property may be thereby averted.

I recommend an immediate appropriation of the sum required for the purpose, to be expended under the direction of the Mississippi River Commission.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 2, 1884.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a tracing of the plat of survey of the unconfirmed private land claim, in the Territory of New Mexico, of the heirs of Francisco Garcia; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 4976) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BECK. I hold in my hand a joint resolution passed by the Legislature of Kentucky. It is very short, and I desire to have it referred appropriately, if it be proper for reference. It reads thus:

[Resolution No. 43.]

Resolution in relation to the life-saving service at Louisville.

Whereas the almost annual recurrence of disastrous floods in our rivers, attended by great destruction of human life and property, renders more and more apparent the imperative necessity of maintaining an efficient corps of life-savers at Louisville: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to use their best efforts to obtain an increased compensation for the gallant members of the life-saving crew now stationed at Louisville, whose heroic conduct and noble self-sacrifices in hours of peril so well merit deserved reward.

The governor is hereby requested to forward a copy of these resolutions to the Kentucky members of Congress.

CHAS. OFFUTT,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
BEN. S. ROBBINS,
Pro tempore Speaker of the Senate.

Approved March 27, 1884.

J. PROCTOR KNOTT.

By the governor:

J. A. McKENZIE,
Secretary of State.

It being in the nature of a memorial, I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read at the desk.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. BECK. I have read it first, perhaps improperly, because I was not sure, as it is addressed to the members of the Kentucky delegation, whether it was properly in the form of a memorial. I now ask that it be treated as such, and move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Iowa; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, as follows:

[Joint Resolution No. 9.]

Joint resolution in regard to grants of public land to railroads.

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa—

First. That in view of the rapid absorption of the public lands of the United States fit for settlement, we do hereby earnestly request our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their influence so that where grants of public land have been made directly to any corporation to aid in building railroads, and the terms of said grants have not been substantially complied with, steps may be immediately taken to have the unearned portion of such lands revert to the United States, that the same may be thrown open to settlement.

Second. That the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, instructed to transmit a copy of the foregoing resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Approved March 27, 1884.

Mr. McPHERSON. I present a resolution of the Board of Trade of the city of Newark, N. J., which reads as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

The Board of Trade of Newark, N. J., adopted the following petition:

"Resolved, That this board respectfully but earnestly petition your honorable body that the bankrupt bills now before you may not become a law. And your petitioners will ever pray."

Signed by the president and secretary of the Board of Trade.

As a bill on this subject has been reported, I move that the resolution lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I present a resolution of the Board of Trade and Exchange of Pensacola, Fla., which reads as follows:

Whereas the withdrawal of this fast-mail service will be a great deprivation to the people of the Southeast and the business interests of this section:

Resolved, That we earnestly petition the Senate of the United States to replace said allowance for the fast-mail service of the Atlantic Coast Line, as the discontinuance of this service will involve the loss of an entire business day to this whole section, and that it will deprive us of postal facilities to which our business interests have become adjusted, and will retard the development of this whole section of country.

I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This paper appearing to be in print can not be received under the strict head of petitions, but if there be no objection it will be received as a paper, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GARLAND presented the petition of Samuel Ward, a citizen of the Cherokee Nation, Indian Territory, praying to be reimbursed for certain property taken from him during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a paper directed to me by citizens of Mansfield, Ohio, but evidently intended for the Senate, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. 1558) to protect innocent purchasers of patented articles. I ask that the paper be received, and move that it be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I present a petition of soldiers and citizens connected with the National League, and indorsed by the governors of the States of Wisconsin, Indiana, Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, Iowa, and Colorado, and also indorsed by the high officers of state in those Commonwealths, the signers numbering about 8,000 citizens and soldiers in those States, praying that a pension of at least $8 a month may be granted to all honorably discharged soldiers of the Union Army and sailors of the Navy who served during the late war.

The petition is accompanied by a communication from Corydon Millard, late chaplain of the Fourth United States Heavy Artillery, now chaplain of the National Soldiers' Home at Milwaukee, urging upon Congress the granting of the prayer of the petition.

I desire to say, without intruding upon the province of the Committee on Pensions or anticipating the judgment of the Senate upon this important request, that it is true there is a very large number of soldiers and sailors who have been unable by the mere loss of evidence and other misfortunes to prove to the satisfaction of the Pension Office the facts which undoubtedly exist upon which a claim to the pension granted by the United States Government is properly based. The rules of the Pension Office place obstacles—I dare say necessary and wise rules in most instances—in the way of establishing the undoubted and unquestioned proof; and a great many persons, perhaps most persons who served during the entire war, were substantially impaired in health mentally or physically for the rest of their lives, although their disability is not one which comes within the existing rule.

Therefore, without entering upon the general question of the policy or propriety of granting this prayer, it seems to me that the Committee on Pensions may very well give their attention to the framing of some measure which shall relieve cases of undoubted suffering and merit which exist in all the States and which are within the experience of all the members of the Senate.

I move that the petition and accompanying letter be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented a memorial of the Mankato (Minn.) Board of Trade, remonstrating against the passage of any act that shall in its effect abridge, restrict, or limit the navigation of the Minnesota River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of George Wallace Hall, late private of Company A, Ninth Regiment Minnesota Volunteers, praying for relief by the removal of the limitation of time prescribed by the act of July 1, 1880, in regard to applications for bounty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of citizens of Damariscotta, Me., praying that an appropriation be made for education in Alaska; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the joint resolution (H. Res. 210) requiring the Secretary of War to furnish copies of certain muster-rolls to the governor of the State of Ohio.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment:

A bill (S. 1885) for the erection of a public building at Wilmington, Del.;

A bill (S. 1810) for the erection of a public building at Sacramento, Cal.; and

A bill (S. 1279) to provide for the erection of a public building at Asheville, N. C.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 304) to give the assent of Congress to the construction of a free bridge by the mayor and city council of Nashville, Tenn., over the Cumberland River, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1721) for a bridge across the Missouri River at White Cloud, in Doniphan County, Kansas, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. SLATER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1425) to grant the Astoria and Winnemucca Railroad Company the right of way through the public lands and the right to construct bridges over navigable water courses, reported it with amendments.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FRYE (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1985) to authorize the appointment of a commission of naval architects and marine engineers to examine and report upon new designs for steamships; which was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, if there be no objection.

Mr. FRYE. To the Committee on Commerce, if the Chair pleases, as the matter is being heard before that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRYE (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1986) to authorize the construction of a merchant ship upon new designs; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MCPHERSON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1987) to amend the patent laws; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. CONGER introduced a bill (S. 1988) for the government and control of the Saint Mary's Falls Canal, Michigan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 1989) for the creation of a silk-culture bureau and the establishment of silk-culture stations; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. GARLAND submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 5377) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

GENERAL WASHINGTON'S SWORD.

Mr. GROOME (by request) submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be directed to inquire into the expediency of purchasing from the Lewis family, for the United States, the sword worn by General George Washington upon the occasion of his resigning his commission to Congress at Annapolis, Md., on the 23d day of December, 1783.

CONGO COUNTRY IN AFRICA.

Mr. GORMAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 1,000 additional copies of Senate report No. 393 of the present session, together with document entitled "Africa No. 3," be printed for the use of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 223) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the mayor of Richmond, Va., a certain amount of flags and bunting for use at a fair; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 1027) for the relief of James H. Woodard; and

A bill (S. 1819) to print certain eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Thomas Allen.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under the eighth rule.

Mr. BLAIR. I move to take up the unfinished business at this time. It will be remembered that at the close of the session yesterday the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] was about to address the Senate. It is convenient to him to go on at this time, and as the debate has been protracted and it is desirable to close it as soon as possible, I hope there will be no objection to the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not propose this morning to antagonize the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, so far as I am concerned. There are a number of Senators who desire to speak on the educational bill, and I am willing to take it up now; but I give notice that hereafter I shall insist, so far as I am concerned (and I think a number of other Senators will do the same), upon giving the morning hour to the consideration of the regular Calendar. As a number of Senators desire to speak to-day upon the educational bill, I shall not interpose any objection to proceeding to its consideration at this time.

Mr. ALLISON. You mean after the educational bill is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that all such motions under the present rules are not open to debate. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. PLUMB to recommit the bill to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COKE. I ask the courtesy of the Senator from Ohio to yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I listened to the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] yesterday until I supposed his argument was about concluded and was absent for a few minutes from the Chamber before its conclusion. Near the conclusion of his speech I find this morning in the RECORD what I did not know yesterday evening had been stated by him. I read from the Senator's speech:

Mr. President, Texas was admitted into the Union in 1845 under a resolution which exempted the United States from any responsibility for her debts. The original proposal made before that contained that as one of the specifications.

After that time Congress paid Texas $10,000,000 for an adjustment of the line between Texas and New Mexico. Five million dollars of that was reserved in the Treasury for the creditors of Texas, who had a pledge of the customs of that State before her annexation. That was all right. But in 1855 there was another act passed, not only paying the $5,000,000 which had then been reserved out of the purchase-money for the line between Texas and New Mexico, but an additional sum of $2,750,000 was given for the purpose of paying the debts of Texas. There was no obligation to pay, and there being no obligation on the part of the Government, it was not the payment of a debt. Being not the payment of a debt or the discharge of an obligation, it was a pure voluntary gift.

But the Senator says that the fact that the State must accept the gift shows that Congress has no power to make it; and yet in that very act the consent of Texas was required; she gave it, and the gift was made.

I desire to say that in this statement, as in many others the Senator made yesterday, he has fallen into a most grievous error. He entirely misapprehends, and is utterly mistaken as to the great historical facts he assumes to narrate in this statement.

After the annexation of Texas there arose a controversy as to the boundary line between Texas and New Mexico. It involved what was then known as the Santa Fé territory. In order to adjust that controversy the United States agreed, if Texas would surrender her claim, to pay to Texas $10,000,000 in interest-bearing stocks. As the creditors of the republic of Texas held a lien upon the customs of Texas, which were transferred to the United States when Texas was annexed, and the creditors were insisting that the United States Government had assumed liability for their debts after they had received the right to collect the customs dues upon which they had the lien, the Government of the United States, in order to shield itself from the responsibility, reserved the right to hold $5,000,000 of the $10,000,000 interest-bearing stock for the payment of the creditors who claimed this lien. Texas assented to this.

It took some time to adjust and audit the debt of Texas. It was not done until 1855. In the mean time the interest was running on the reserved $5,000,000, and when in 1855 the United States Congress, after the Texas debt had been audited, came to make an appropriation of the money for its payment, it was found that $1,250,000 of interest had accrued. That was added to the principal, $5,000,000, making $6,250,000. In addition to that, there was pending a claim against the Government of the United States for the depredations by Indians belonging to and under the control of this Government upon the republic of Texas and afterward upon the State of Texas. This claim had been formally presented and was being urged. In the adjustment of this matter, as the debates show when the appropriation was made, an additional sum of $1,500,000 was added to the $6,250,000, making in all $7,750,000, which was appropriated, and as the concluding section of the act of appropriation of February, 1855, shows, upon the express condition that it should be assented to by the State of Texas, and that the State of Texas should withdraw and abandon her then pending claim against the Government for Indian depredations.

So the $2,750,000 which the Senator from Mississippi says was presented as a gift to Texas by the United States consisted of $1,250,000 of interest upon the stocks of Texas held in the Treasury of the United States and $1,500,000 which was paid to Texas in compromise of her claim against the Government for Indian depredations.

Mr. MAXEY. And those funds were interest-bearing bonds.

Mr. COKE. Of course. I said that it was interest-bearing stock.

Now, the Senator from Mississippi says that the $2,750,000 was a gift, and that Texas accepted the gift; and that is a point which he makes in his argument in favor of this bill. In making that point the Senator simply shows that he had not made an examination of this question, which if properly made (and which he should have made) would have led him to the true facts.

Mr. President, this is about all that I desire to say. I wished to make this explanation and to refute this statement because it affects my State and because it ignores great historical facts, shown by the legislation of Congress, by the debates of that period, by the compromise bill of 1850 under which the first arrangement for the sale of the Santa Fé territory was made. The Government of the United States has never given Texas one single cent, and there is in the Treasury now, uncalled for, $60,000 of the $7,750,000 appropriated for the creditors of Texas.

Any other misstatement or misapprehension of the Senator (and I will state that there are various of them in his speech) I shall not advert to, because I am satisfied that the record of the debate will take care of itself. What he has said is in print and what I have said is in print; but this matter had not been referred to before, and therefore I deemed it necessary and proper that I should make this explanation and vindicate the truth of history.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PENDLETON. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator from Texas who has just addressed the Senate makes the same success in pointing out the many other errors which he says exist in my speech as he has done in the one to which he has called special attention and no more, he would be well excused from making any attempt on that subject.

I said that Texas had been made the recipient of a gift from the United States and she had accepted the gift. I was well aware that the act under which the gift was made contained a provision that she should withdraw an unfounded claim which she had set up against the Government of the United States. The United States undertakes and assumes no responsibility, recognizes none, to pay for Indian depredations either on the citizens of foreign countries or on our own citizens, and the fact that Texas assumed and presented a claim of that character against the Government only proves, what I said in my speech yesterday, that Texas seemed to have considered that the Constitution of the United States and the Government of the United States was made for her especial benefit, to give her rights and privileges not granted to the other States of the Union.

It is very evident, it is a proposition which I asserted in my speech yesterday, that if a payment be made out of the Treasury of the United States where there is no obligation to pay, where there is no debt, no duty to pay, the payment is a pure gift, and you can not make anything else out of it. And so, sir, with reference to some other provisions alluded to by the Senator in his remarks this morning, Texas seems to have assumed an exceptional right against the Government of the United States. Claims were presented against the United States to pay the debt of Texas because, forsooth, the customs, the revenues from importations by Texas had been surrendered by her annexation to the United States. The same thing happened when the Constitution was formed in 1789. Every State prior to the formation of the Constitution had the right to levy customs duties. They were theirs, and yet they were all surrendered by their incorporation into the American Union under the Constitution, and no State on that account was recognized by the United States as having a right to call on the United States to pay its debts.

This is a full answer to the position of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me a moment further?

Mr. PENDLETON. Yes, sir.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi said:

> But in 1855 there was another act passed, not only paying the $5,000,000 which had then been reserved out of the purchase-money for the line between Texas and New Mexico, but an additional sum of $2,750,000 was given for the purpose of paying the debts of Texas. There was no obligation to pay, and there being no obligation on the part of the Government, it was not the payment of a debt.

I have shown that $1,250,000 of that $2,750,000 was for interest accrued on bonds belonging to Texas.

Mr. GEORGE. On that point I admit I was mistaken as to the amount of the gift; but the question between the Senator and myself was not so much as to the amount, as to the fact that a gift was made. One million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars was given.

Mr. COKE. Well, then, the Senator is forced to admit that he was wrong as to more than half of it. When the republic of Texas had a claim which her authorities were pressing at the time of annexation for Indian depredations, when that claim, after annexation, was taken up by the State authorities and was being urged, and when, as I can show in the debates on this subject, Mr. Clay said Texas was entitled to $3,000,000 on this score, the honorable Senator from Mississippi, for the purpose of making a point in his argument, undertakes to decide that the claim had no validity, that the United States had no right or power to negotiate with the authorities of Texas and compromise it, and that therefore it was a pure and simple gift. An argument based upon such a hypothesis can not certainly go very far nor have much influence in this country.

Mr. MAXEY. Allow me to say that the Senator from Mississippi not only undertakes to decide what my colleague says, but undertakes to decide that the Senate and House that passed that bill and the President who approved it did not know what they were doing.

Mr. COKE. Of course. The Senator from Mississippi sets himself up to review the past conduct of this Government about this matter, and for the purpose of making a point in his argument assumes that what this Government in all its branches thought was the right thing to do, to wit, to pay a million and a half of dollars in the settlement of this claim, was a perfectly void and invalid act, in order that he may construe it as a pure and simple gift. I am entirely willing that the Senator's statement may go for what it is worth. It is a fair sample of his reasoning on this bill.

Mr. GEORGE. I hope I may be indulged one remark.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOAR). The Senator from Ohio is entitled to the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. PENDLETON. I will yield for one remark.

Mr. GEORGE. I never asserted, as the Senator from Texas says, that this was a perfectly void act of the Congress of the United States. It was he who asserted that gifts made by the United States to the States were void. I insisted that the Government had a right to make a gift, and I cited it as an instance in which it had made a gift. That is the distinction. I made no such assertion. I criticised nobody. I did not criticise Texas even for accepting or the Government for giving it. I cited it to show that the power to give by the Government to a State had been exercised in that case by the consent of the United States and of the State of Texas. That is all there is in it.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, the length and scope of this debate make it very difficult to say anything which is either new in itself or new in its guise. I shall not endeavor to do either. Indeed, I would have been very content to follow my usual habit of giving my vote in silence and not troubling the Senate with my reasons, if I were not in this case a little divided as betwixt two. My judgment is very clear as to what ought to be done. My sympathies and sensibilities to some extent impel me in a different direction, and therefore I have thought it right to explain very briefly to those who are interested the view on which I shall give my vote upon this bill.

We have had several definitions of this bill. The honorable Senator who introduced it and stands sponsor for it on the floor [Mr. BLAIR] said in the course of his remarks that it was a bill to fit the voters to exercise intelligently the franchise. The honorable Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] defined it as a bill to extirpate illiteracy. Other Senators have spoken of it as a bill to relieve the States, to perpetuate the Union, to strengthen the Government, to perfect the scheme of emancipation, or perhaps to compensate some of its consequences, according as Senators have followed the dictates of their own fancy or the different appreciation they may have of the value of these respective results.

In plainer language, Mr. President, this is simply a bill to appropriate $105,000,000 to the purposes of education within the States. That amount is to be paid in ten unequal annual installments. It is to be paid in proportion to the ignorant people within the limits of the States. It is to be taken from the Federal Treasury, into which it is first to be gathered by a system of taxation which, if the Constitution be obeyed, shall be uniform throughout the United States. If taxation is to be limited to the ordinary expenses of the Government, then additional taxation shall be imposed to raise the amount. If $300,000,000 have sufficed for the expenses of the Government heretofore, then an additional $15,000,000 for the first year and something less afterward must be raised by increased taxation in order to meet the appropriation which this bill seeks to make.

The process is very simple. A new tax bill must be devised; a new tax must be levied upon tea or coffee, or an additional tax upon woolen manufactures or iron manufactures imported into the country, or upon tobacco and whisky produced within its limits. Fifteen million dollars are to be raised; all the people of all the country are to contribute, and these fifteen millions are to be expended not in the proportion in which all shall contribute, but in a different proportion; those as a rule receiving the most who have contributed the least.

It seems almost unnecessary to say, and yet it appears to me very useful to recall to ourselves and to each other that the Government has no independent fortune; that it has not one cent of money except that which is contributed to it by the people; that every dollar of appropriation means a dollar of taxation; and that if we were wise and logical we should in the first section of every bill impose a tax and provide the exact amount which in the second section of the bill we authorize to be expended. It would aid us, I think, to understand this particular bill if its draughtsman had provided in the first section thus: That in addition to all the taxes now levied by law there shall be levied and assessed and collected 3 cents a pound upon coffee imported into the United States, or 22 cents upon tea, or 31 per cent. ad valorem in addition to the 60 per cent. now levied upon all woolen goods and clothing and blankets imported into the United States, or 38 per cent. ad valorem in addition to the 40 per cent. duty (if I state correctly the figure) imposed upon all iron and steel manufactures, or 6 cents additional upon every pound of tobacco, or 22 cents in addition upon every gallon of whisky that is produced; and that the second section should provide that all the money collected from these additional taxes shall be distributed to aid in the education of citizens within the several States.

I have taken some pains to look into this matter, and I think I state fairly what would be the additional taxation upon any of these articles necessary to raise the $15,000,000 a year, at least for the first year, which as provided by this bill shall be expended. It ought to be a tax bill as well as an appropriation bill. There ought to be a levy of additional taxes in the early part of the bill, that we may understand what its scope and nature is when we come to examine the later portions.

Mr. President, I have listened to this debate with all the attention and interest which its importance demands. Sympathizing as I do with the desire that every child in the Republic throughout all its limits shall have the benefits of education, I have waited anxiously, listened patiently for a complete vindication of the constitutionality and expediency of this bill, if it can be made. Not one word has been said in favor of the advantages of education to which my judgment has not given its most hearty assent. Not an appeal has been made to elevate those who were property and not men, at least not citizens before their emancipation, which has not awakened every humane impulse of my heart. Not one word has been said so eloquently by the honorable Senator from Georgia who sits before me [Mr. BROWN] of the sufferings and losses of the Southern people during the war and as its consequence which did not evoke from me a feeling of sadness that men so worthy had met with such adverse fates. I heard with the greatest pleasure the statements that were read on this floor from gentlemen who have devoted themselves and their lives to education, not only as to the temper and spirit of the people of those States, but as to the heroic efforts they were now making to do the very thing for themselves that this bill provides they shall be aided in doing. When I heard the statements of Mr. Mayo and some of these gentlemen read here on the floor of the Senate I felt an honest pride that these men, showing such magnanimity, such self-reliance, such heroism in doing their duty, were our brethren according to the flesh, descendants of the same blood and race, coheirs of the same liberty, and worthy to be codefenders of the same free Government.

I have noticed—and who has not?—the courage, the fidelity, and persistency of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire in charge of this bill, who has defended it so ably. I am sure that I may say with the concurrence of all gentlemen on this floor, and without trenching at all upon the limits of propriety, that they have seen with admiration the facility with which he has been willing to amend his bill to make it conform to the views of all gentlemen who are in favor of the same general scheme, and the entire fairness with which he has treated the motives and the purposes of those who are directly opposed to the whole system which he seeks to introduce.

I yield to no man in my estimate of the value of educational training, not even to the honorable Senator from Mississippi, whom I do not see now in his place [Mr. LAMAR], who with more than his usual force and felicity spoke of the power of intellectual training in freeing men from the bondage of their passions and prejudices and superstitions. I think that training is of inestimable value to the man in isolation, to the man in society, to the man in government. It makes him a better man, a better neighbor, a more important and influential factor in the great problem of free government. I distinguish, as did the honorable Senator from South Carolina so eloquently the other day [Mr. BUTLER], between intelligence and intellectual vigor and mere book learning. I do not compare them; I do not contrast them. They are both important, they are both essential, and the one supplements that wherein the other fails.

Education mitigates the low and groveling condition in which our grosser passions and vices find a congenial and productive soil. As the moral and intellectual powers increase, the opportunity and the necessity for mere brute force in government diminish. The man governs himself, and in the practice of that high quality of character he learns and he practices that divine charity whose maxim is, "Bear ye one another's burdens," and of that still diviner justice which says, "Do unto others as you would that they should do unto you." As these are the essential elements of a high moral character, so they are the best constituents of a high civic character devoted to performing the duties of a citizen. Nature made an impassable gulf between man and the brute creation. There is an immeasurably greater distance, happily not impassable, between those whose faculties, dull and dimmed and imbruted, lie all dormant, and those whose faculties, awakened, vivified, energized, alert, appreciate and employ the opportunites of development which lie all around them. Intellectual training removes the man from close proximity to the beasts that perish, and, carrying him through all the gradations of beneficent development, places him finally where we are told that God and nature intended him to be, "a little lower than the angels, and crowned with glory and honor."

It was a noble son of New England, himself one of the best illustrations of the benefits and beauties of culture, who, in contrasting the character of the ignorant and the educated man, said that to the ignorant man the earth and air and sea and sky, the glorious pomp of day, the sparkling mysteries of night are but an outward pageant governed by ungoverned chance, valued only as they minister to the supply of sensual wants; that to him all nature was silent; but to the man whose mind is stored with knowledge the mystery is unfolded, the veil is uplifted as one by one he turns the leaves of the great volume of creation, mental, moral, and physical, whose every page is inscribed with characters of wisdom and power and love; that to him all nature is vocal, and he hears the echoes of that divine language in which "day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge."

Mr. President, if the alternative were the passage of this bill advocated by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire and this illiteracy with all its weaknesses and all its vices and the loss of these incomparable benefactions, I should be sorely tempted to lay aside all constitutional objections, all the conservative wisdom which the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] enforced so strongly the other day, and to stand side by side with those who are in favor of the passage of this measure. But that is not the alternative. There is another way, a better way, a wiser way, a more constitutional way of accomplishing the same purpose.

I have scrutinized very carefully the Constitution for the purpose of finding a power to pass this measure. I can find it in none of the express grants; I can find it in none of the inevitable implications. It may be there; I have not been able to find it. I have not been so instructed by this discussion that I could intelligently put my finger upon it. So far as I have been able to follow this discussion I have not seen that there was a standing-place for the friends of this bill except where the Senator from Arkansas stands and where he seeks to put the authority to pass this bill. He places it in that clause of the Constitution to provide for the general welfare, which he thinks is an independent, separate power. I can not yield my assent to his interpretation of this clause. I can not bring my judgment to the conclusion that in a written Constitution of defined and limited powers, made with extreme jealousy and caution by those States which came together to frame it, the instrument wherein so many pages are expended in defining the powers of the Congress, its authors would sweep all limitations aside, and under a power to provide for the general welfare should leave it to the discretion and judgment and conscience of the legislator as to what he shall do and what he shall not do in the attainment of the purposes of the Government.

The honorable Senator from New Hampshire in the course of his very able remarks in the opening of this debate said that the Government of course had the power to perpetuate itself. Standing upon that postulate, his reasoning is very clear and obvious. Education, says he, is necessary to the intelligent exercise of the right of suffrage; the intelligent exercise of the suffrage is essential to the perpetuity of the Government; therefore, under the power to perpetuate itself the Government of the United States may enter within the limits of the States and educate the voters. I submit to the honorable Senator that he passes away beyond the provisions of the tenth amendment, which declares that all power not granted by the Constitution is reserved to the States and to the people respectively.

I deny the proposition that the Government has any such power to perpetuate itself. The power of this Government for its own perpetution stands on no such unsubstantial basis. The fathers when they organized the Constitution and Government knew that it would be assailed, and they provided in express terms and by direct language the powers it might exercise in order to its own perpetuation. I repeat, as I said before in the debate on a bill involving the powers of the Federal Government, that it is only within the limits of that book [holding up the Constitution] that you must find the powers of the Government, and if they are not to be found there the scheme must fail, even though the alternative be the life or death of the Government.

What says this Constitution as to the power of perpetuating the Government? "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes;" but if the resources of taxation should fail at any time and it be necessary to have money to perpetuate the Government, the Congress may "borrow money on the credit of the United States;" and if its perpetuation depends upon any of its commercial relations, the many and the varied interests that grow up in the constant and ready intercourse which in these modern times exist between nations, "the Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States." If danger threatens from abroad, "the Congress shall have power to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal," and in order to do this effectively "the Congress shall have power to raise and support armies; to provide and maintain a navy; to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces;" and in case of domestic insurrection, in case of sudden invasion, in case of any of those emergencies which sometimes arise which are not war, but nevertheless require the intervention of force "the Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question? I should like to do so at this point.

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask him if the Constitution was the same as it now is, providing for the establishment of a government in the legislative, executive, and judicial departments, and all the other powers which it now contains as expressly granted powers and powers granted by implication were therein, save only the express grant which it now contains of the power to levy and collect taxes, there being no such grant as that of the power to levy and collect taxes—I ask whether he thinks that the power to levy and collect taxes to carry out the other powers, to establish and continue the Government, would or would not exist?

Mr. PENDLETON. That would depend altogether upon the way in which the Constitution was framed and on the language in which the powers were given. In the absence of a direct power to levy taxes there might be an injunction upon the Government to do certain things which would require money, and then it might levy taxes.

Mr. BLAIR. My question supposed the Constitution to be just as it now is, its phraseology precisely what it now is, minus simply the express grant of power to levy and collect taxes; and was whether or not then he thinks we should have a Government of the United States?

Mr. PENDLETON. I think we should have a very poor Government of the United States unless it had some power to collect taxes.

Mr. BLAIR. That is not the question I desired to put. I asked if by the very fact that the Government is established, in express terms there is not carried along with it the power to levy and collect taxes in order that it may exist and carry out the powers which it unquestionably possesses and which it can not exercise without the power to levy and collect taxes?

While I am on the floor, having put that question, if the Senator will permit me to follow it with another I shall not trouble him again.

Mr. PENDLETON. Well, sir, I am happy to yield.

Mr. BLAIR. I feel as though I had no right to intrude in this debate so often, but since the Senator pointed his remarks to me somewhat, I think he will excuse me in asking this additional question. We all start with the concession that intelligence is necessary to the existence of governments republican in form. We claim that the National Government is a government republican in form, and we devolve upon it not only the duty to protect itself and to exercise its own powers as such government, but the additional duty of guaranteeing to the States governments republican in form.

Now I ask whether, when intelligence is indispensable to the existence of a national government republican in form, and the parent neglects to educate the child that is to be the citizen as well of the State as of the nation and as well of the nation as of the State, and the State included geographically within the territory of the nation fails to educate the child within its geographical borders, and thus illiteracy becomes a universal darkness throughout the entire extent of the national territory, that national government has not from necessity the right, if it has the right to live at all, to exercise this power which neither the parent nor the State has exercised, in order that it may create the American citizen?

I am aware that this ground is not a ground on which gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber have placed the debate; but it is a ground to which no Senator has addressed himself as yet on either side of the Chamber who objects to this bill, and I should be glad to hear some one of stronger powers who comprehends this matter clearly reply to that position.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I have been endeavoring to say that I did not see anywhere in the Constitution a provision empowering the Federal Government to educate the children of the States. I do not find it here.

Mr. BLAIR. I would inquire of the Senator if he thinks that is essential to the education of the child that is to be the citizen of both nation and State?

Mr. PENDLETON. I think it is essential to the interference of the Government of the United States with the education of children within the States that the Government should have the constitutional power, and I do not find such a power here.

Mr. BLAIR. Very well; I think it is there; but it is a matter of opinion.

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly it is a matter of opinion and argument. I do not find it here. I do not find it in the provisions which have been made by the Constitution for power in the Federal Government to perpetuate itself. While I find that it may use force, that it may levy taxes, that it may borrow money, that it may raise and support armies, I find the extraordinary omission, if it were not really intentional, of a power to go into the limits of the States to educate the children there.

Now, to answer the gentleman's question as clearly as I can, I can imagine a constitution so framed, a constitution of the United States, if you please, so framed as that a necessary implication would be that taxes should be levied and collected; and I can imagine, if a person may be allowed to imagine an act of idiocy on the part of those who framed the Constitution, that it might be so framed that without that express grant there would not be the power to levy a dollar of taxes, and that if the Government could not be supported without that dollar it would have to die.

I am one of those who believe in the strict construction of the Constitution. It is nothing to say to me that if the Government does not exercise certain powers the Government can not go on. Then it is because the Government has not the power to go on. I do not find in the Constitution any provision—I have not found it; I have sought for it diligently; I would like to find it—any power to provide for the education of the voters of the United States. I do not find it. I was answering the argument of the Senator from New Hampshire made some time ago that the Government has the right to perpetuate itself, and I think I have shown that the powers which the fathers thought necessary to its perpetuation are defined and granted. I do not find this grant which the gentleman invokes among them. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], seeming to adopt this idea of the Senator from New Hampshire that there is some power of self-perpetuation which did not need to be found in any of the express grants, limited the power to those cases in which there was inability on the part of the State to provide for the education of its citizens.

Mr. President, if there is anything in the argument of the Senator from New Hampshire that literacy is necessary on the part of the voters to the preservation of the Government, then the limitation of the Senator from Connecticut seems not to be well taken. Illiteracy is as injurious where the State is able and unwilling as where the State is unable to educate its children; and if it be that the Federal Government must educate the children of unwilling States as well as unable States, we come to the result that it has the power and should educate the children wherever illiteracy exists. The honorable Senator from Missouri who sits behind me [Mr. VEST] completely disposed of that suggestion when he turned to the clause of the Constitution and read that the qualifications of voters for Federal offices should be those prescribed by the State for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. That is utterly inconsistent with the idea that there is an obligation upon the Federal Government to go into the States and provide that all children shall be literates with a view of providing that illiteracy shall be a disqualification under the Constitution.

The result is, Mr. President, that the whole subject of education is allowed to remain within the States as one of the essential attributes of self-government, of local government, without the power to control which there could be none of the autonomy of the State.

The honorable Senator from Florida who sits beside me [Mr. JONES], acute as he always is, unable to find a grant in the Constitution anywhere else, finally said that he thought we must look to the amendments to the Constitution providing for the emancipation of the slaves for this power of education. Sir, if the gentleman had contented himself by saying that he thought the necessity was great by reason of the emancipation of the slaves and the throwing of this large body of ignorant people within the States, I quite agree with him; but when from the exercise of a war power to emancipate he seems to deduce the peace power of educating those people, I must say that I can not follow him in his reasoning. Suppose, as might readily happen, that these men thus emancipated had turned out to be, as they have not, paupers and vagabonds in the States; would he claim that the power of the Federal Government goes to the extent, if it were necessary to exercise it, of establishing poor-houses, infirmaries, and jails there? Suppose they had been turbulent—I mean turbulent not in the sense of insurrection, but turbulent in the community—would it be the duty of the Government, because it had exercised this power of emancipation and thrown these ignorant people within the States, to go there and establish soup-houses for their physical comfort and jails for their imprisonment? I think not; and yet the argument is as perfect in the one case as in the other.

If the power of educating is to be deduced from the fact that the Federal Government has thrown into the States a great mass of ignorant men, does it not follow as an inevitable conclusion by the same method of reasoning that if by throwing these same people upon the States pauperism and crime have been increased, it is the duty of the Federal Government to relieve its act of these unhappy consequences and for their punishment or care or support?

The honorable Senator from Mississippi now in the Chamber [Mr. GEORGE] deduces this power of education from an unlimited power of taxation, as I understand him—I mean unlimited within certain ranges; I am not pressing that point too far—unlimited within the range of appropriation to subjects of a general and public interest. I submit to that gentleman, who is so forcible and so logical, that the argument goes too far; that if there be an unlimited power of appropriation in the Federal Government under the Constitution, then, as every act of the Government needs an appropriation, every subject is brought within the scope of its powers, and that it is only necessary to superadd very little of the doctrine announced yesterday that if Congress may appropriate money it must have the jurisdiction to define the methods of the expenditure of that money and power over the subject upon which it is expended to convert this into an unlimited Government, in which all grants and all limitations are alike unnecessary. If the right exist to appropriate money for all purposes whatever except those that are expressly prohibited, and there be a right also to follow that appropriation and to see to its proper expenditure, I want to know where is the limit upon the power of the Federal Government?

Mr. President, something has been said here as to the precedents which have been made, and I have noticed that gentlemen relied very greatly upon the fact that in the early history and even in the later history of the Government there have been large appropriations of land for the purposes of education. That is true, sir. But I call the attention of gentlemen who stand so much upon that suggestion to the fact that the original policy in regard to the appropriation of land, so far as it applied to all the donations of the original States, including that magnificent domain which the liberality of Virginia ceded to the Government of the United States, was adopted before the formation of the Constitution, during the period of the Confederation. The resolution of 1780, the ordinance of 1784, the ordinance of 1787 were all passed by the Congress of the Confederation, in which, having equal vote, the States that gave and the States that received appropriated certain proportions of the land for the purpose of education.

This Government came into operation finding that policy already inaugurated, that it had been carried out in all the surveys of the lands which had been made prior to the adoption of the Constitution; and although I have not been able to trace it up, I put to gentlemen whether in the fact that this policy had been inaugurated with the consent of all the confederated States they do not find the origin of that provision in the Constitution upon which the Senator from Texas placed so much stress, that Congress shall have power to make rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator allow me to make a remark?

Mr. PENDLETON. I yield.

Mr. MAXEY. In addition to what the Senator has so well stated, the Congress of the Confederation was in session at the time the convention was in session.

Mr. PENDLETON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAXEY. The ordinance of 1787 was adopted by Congress on the 13th of July, 1787, both bodies being then in session. The convention was in session and the Constitution was finally adopted in 1789, and the very outset of the Government was followed by the disposition of the Northwest Territory adopted by Congress under the Constitution as laid down in the ordinance of 1787.

Mr. PENDLETON. The suggestion of the Senator from Texas is very apropos, and I am very glad that he has made it. It adds force to the idea that I was endeavoring to enforce upon the Senate at that time.

But, Mr. President, not only was the policy adopted and in operation at the time of the formation of the Constitution and the inauguration of the Government, but in all the early history of this Government, and I am not prepared to say but that in all the later history, whenever a State was admitted into the Union there was an express exemption of the lands sold by the United States for five years after the sale from any taxation by State authority. That was made a consideration, inadequate it may have been, a sharp bargain it may not have been, but that was one of the considerations on which the grant for various purposes connected with education was made to the States.

Besides that, as has already been said here, the Government of the United States was a large owner of land, and under the provisions of the Constitution it felt itself authorized to give away some of those lands in order to improve the rest. It felt authorized to make donations for various advantages which would accrue to it in the sale of the residue of those lands. It was upon that idea that all the grants to railroads have been made; it was upon that idea that the grants to educational purposes were made. I find no similarity between a case of that kind and the case of levying taxes and giving money, notwithstanding the acuteness with which gentlemen have argued that if the Government can give lands it can give the money which would buy the land or the money for which the land would be sold. I find no authority in this precedent of giving land for the claim that is now made that the Government may enter upon a career of taxing the people in order to make appropriations for the benefit of education.

So, Mr. President, without spending more time upon this branch of the subject, I have not been able to bring my mind to the conclusion that there is constitutional authority to do the thing proposed by this bill, much as I would be glad, in one sense at least, to use that power if I could find it here.

We have been told that the figures offered by the Senator from New Hampshire show that this bill is intended mainly and chiefly for the benefit of the Southern States.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will permit me to say that it is not because they are Southern States.

Mr. PENDLETON. Not at all.

Mr. BLAIR. It is simply because the rivers and harbors of ignorance happen to be located there just now.

Mr. PENDLETON. I understood thoroughly the ground on which it is said that the benefits are to be derived by the Southern States, not because they happen to be located in that part of our country, but, as the gentleman has said, because the rivers and harbors of ignorance are there.

Mr. President, if that is the purpose of this bill, the bill would commend itself to me if that purpose were definitely and distinctly expressed. If there be constitutional power to pass this bill because of the existence of illiteracy in those States and the necessity of getting rid of illiteracy, then I desire to confine its operation to the States which have not the power to remove this curse, if it be a curse, which exists by reason of circumstances over which they had no control.

I have no disposition to tax Massachusetts or Iowa to provide for the illiterates of Ohio or any of the other States which are abundantly able to take care of their own illiterates; and if I must say it, I have no disposition to tax Ohio for the benefit of those States which are quite as able as Ohio and quite as willing to take care of the system of education within their limits.

But suppose, sir, it is true that the benefits of this bill are to accrue chiefly to the Southern States, what sort of a feast is it to which they are invited? The honorable Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] has introduced an amendment to this bill which provides that Federal officeholders shall be appointed and sent to the States to interfere with the administration of this fund and to appropriate it according to their discretion under the authority of this law, always taking care to consult the State authorities. The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] made a statement here the other day which may have a great deal of truth in it, that the experience of giving develops the fact that one dollar raised by self-sacrifice and self-denial is worth ten dollars given to any people to aid them in any work of this sort; and it seemed to me that the extent of the gentleman's charity is to stimulate the people of these Southern States to do for themselves rather than to help them do.

My honorable colleague [Mr. SHERMAN] has introduced an amendment to this bill, which provides that it shall be a condition precedent to any money going into any one of the States of the South that it shall pass an ordinance providing that this fund shall be distributed according to illiteracy down through the counties and cities and townships, even when practicable to the smallest possible school district.

These gentlemen, in varying terms and doubtless with most excellent intent, all of them say in effect to these people of the Southern States "You are needy; you are poor; the results of the war have left you in that condition; you can not educate the ignorant and the poor who by the circumstances of the war have been thrown upon you; we want from our abundance to aid you, but your habits, your education, your traditions, your ways of dealing with these colored people have been such as that you can not be intrusted with the administration of this fund, and we will expend it either by our own officers, or we will prescribe that you shall by the solemn act and covenant of your State give guarantee for the fidelity with which you will exercise this high trust that we propose to repose in you." I do not know how gentlemen feel about it; but to me it seemed very much, when I heard one or two of the speeches in this debate, as if Senators were saying to these gentlemen of the South, "We will give you of our abundance, you shall be the recipients of our bounty, but in order to entitle you to it you must put your hands upon your mouths and your mouths in the dust before us."

Mr. President, is that an invitation which will be accepted? Is it an invitation that will be invited? What is it? "Give up your autonomy; confide to us the education of your children; abandon your home rule; give up this which is the very essential of your State organization"—and for what? Merely that these Southern States may receive out of the Treasury of the United States that which they themselves have put into it; merely that there shall be distributed to them again by Federal authority out of the Federal Treasury that which these same recipients have themselves contributed to it.

Where does this money come from? From taxation. Who pays all the taxes? The twelve or fourteen or sixteen million of our Southern brethren, as well as those at the North—I discard the words "North" and "South"—as well as those of the States which propose to give to the needier States this bounty. They are taxed upon all their clothing, they are taxed upon all their agricultural implements, they are taxed upon their shoes, they are taxed upon their hoes and their spades, they are taxed upon the growth of their lands, they are taxed in their full proportion of the amount that goes into the Treasury of the United States. Now they are asked to give up one of the dearest rights of statehood in order that they may hereafter go through the same process of paying into the Treasury that which is to be paid out to them again. The taxation upon these and the other States has given to the Treasury of the United States last year a surplus of $130,000,000 or thereabouts, this year $85,000,000, and for next year $106,000,000 I think are estimated as the probable surplus, an average of $100,000,000 a year.

Now, Mr. President, so adjust your system of taxation that instead of having a surplus of $100,000,000 a year you will have a surplus of $10,000,000, if you think so much is necessary, then enough money will remain in the hands of the citizens of these States to supply for themselves all the educational interests of the States. This is upon the basis of the enormous expenditures of the Federal Government. Go further. Reduce those expenditures to their proper limit, cut off the extravagance which has gotten to be one of the banes of our present system, let the Federal Government be reduced to the simple and narrow limits prescribed for it by the Constitution, let your revenues be small and your taxes low, and then these gentlemen who are to be benefited, as you say, by this bounty will themselves keep at home within their own limits a fund as large as this which you propose to give to them, and devote it according to their own good judgment in the education of their people. Reverse this whole system, economize your expenditures, break down the system by which bounties are paid to private interests at the expense of those people whom you propose now to benefit.

It has been said, I do not know with how much truth, that under our present system of taxation where one dollar goes into the Treasury five go the support of private interests; but in any event, whether the statement is exaggerated or not, we know that in its incipiency the system has this fundamental idea that there shall be bounty and there shall be protection. Cut it all up by the roots, reduce the expenditures, reduce the revenue, limit the taxation, lessen the burden, abandon this system of taking away from the people with one hand in order that you may give back to them with the other. Leave them their money, and above all leave to them the regulation of their own affairs, and especially their school system.

This, Mr. President, I think is the better way and the wiser way and the constitutional way of which I spoke. I invoke gentlemen upon the other side, I invoke gentlemen upon this side who stand in either supporting or opposing this bill, to lend their best efforts to remitting all the burdens that have been put upon these people, and allowing them to expend the amounts so remitted, rather than to first levy a tax upon them and then distribute the proceeds to them afterwards.

I believe that with a system of that kind, fairly inaugurated, doing detriment to no interest in this country, doing injury to no single interest in it that is avowedly in the care of the Government, the necessity of the passage of this bill can be obviated. I believe that you will have a better system of education, that you will have a better system of schools. I rejoice that a way is open to us to aid these heroic and magnanimous men who according to the testimony to which I have alluded have already done so much by their patient fortitude to rescue themselves and their fortunes from the losses which the war entailed and to do justice to that great body of people who challenge our compassion and who were thrown on them for support without their concurrence.

I rejoice that these Southern States are so able to perform this duty. They have suffered, God knows; misfortunes have attacked them on every side. The honorable gentleman from Georgia who sits before me, in a way that was as painful as it was graphic, told us how on every side they were beset by losses; but still they are magnificent Commonwealths in this confederation of States. They have a salubrious climate; they have a good soil; they have rivers and railroads and means of communication in all parts of their land; they are gathering strength; they are doing a noble and heroic duty; they are carrying forward education now to a better point perhaps than it will be carried if this Federal Government interferes with it, and they have increased in population 47 per cent. within the last ten years. Their social troubles are disappearing; their labor system is becoming settled; they are beginning to prosper; they are trying the experiment of manufacturing, with the raw material, the fuel, the breadstuffs, all close at hand, with transportation abundant and cheap. They are successful.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] shakes his head. Four millions have been the increase of these States since 1870, if there is faith to be placed in the official records of the Census Department. They have increased in population. Their valuation of property does not show as it did before the war, because those who were counted as property then are counted as men now. I do not believe that their power to bear taxation is substantially diminished; but if it were and I were required to aid them, it would be done in the way that I have indicated, by remitting the burdens that are imposed upon them by the extravagance and wastefulness of the Federal Government and allowing them to help themselves out of those resources, instead of exhausting them for the benefit of private interests in the rest of the country.

Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Mississippi not now in his seat [Mr. LAMAR], with a felicity of diction which is peculiarly his own, said the other day that institutions and governments and laws and all the fixed facts of society are not instituted by statute, but they are the reflections of the hopes and aspirations and inner life of the people themselves; and he said that freedom which is the culmination of all these institutions which go to make up free government, was that great and final and consummate blessing vouchsafed to those who are brave and courageous and faithful and enduring, who think right and do right in all the exigencies of individual and national life.

He was right, and I would like to submit to him if he were here whether it is not a dangerous experiment upon which he proposes to enter when he seeks to lead men who have shown themselves according to that high test so worthy of freedom and to be supporters of a free government to look away from their own self-denial, their own self-reliance, their own willingness to labor and to wait, and turn their eyes to the beneficence of a paternal government.

If it be true that this consummate flower of all the beautiful and beneficent institutions with which Heaven has blessed man in his best estate depends upon himself, grows upon the sturdy and hardy and heroic virtues which consist in self-training, in self-abnegation, self-reliance, in industry, in fidelity to high purposes—if that be true, is it not a dangerous experiment to lead such a people, who have developed these qualities so magnificently, to turn away from their cultivation and to lean upon the paternal arm of the Government of the United States? For myself, Mr. President, I prefer the other way. Gentlemen must walk in the way they think best according to their conscience and their judgment.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, for some time after this bill was reported I regarded it as a sort of sentimental proposition, which would hardly be seriously considered, and I have no idea now that it will be at the other end of the Capitol. It has, however, called forth learned and very divergent views on the constitutional powers and limitations of Congress.

I am content to stand on the position so well maintained by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE]. His able and exhaustive argument has not been and, in my opinion, can not be answered. I had assumed that we would earnestly address ourselves to the reduction of taxation and the removal of burdens from the people, and not to devising plausible schemes to maintain them by squandering the surplus revenue, which has in the last nine months reached $82,000,000. Independent of all questions of power, I am opposed to this and all kindred schemes, which I regard as so many devices to furnish additional excuses for maintaining high taxation. The surplus revenue now needlessly and wrongfully collected to the detriment of all business interests is by this scheme to be absorbed to the amount of $105,000,000, the faith of the Government being pledged for ten years to come to maintain taxation on an average of over $10,000,000 annually beyond the needs of the Government, even under its present extravagant management.

Other plausible schemes looking to the same end are before the Senate. One is to pay now all the interest on the outstanding bonds that are payable in 1891 and 1907 in excess of 2½ per cent. and issue in lieu of the bonds now outstanding others bearing 2½ per cent., thus getting rid of about $200,000,000, without reducing the principal of the debt, for the sake of paying less interest hereafter. A needless sinking fund of $50,000,000 a year is sought to be maintained; many millions are to be absorbed by pensions and all sorts of claims, by steel cruisers and big guns on patriotic pretenses; in short, every device is resorted to which will maintain the present high rate of taxation and enable the Republican party to enter the canvass denouncing all our efforts at reform or reduction of taxes with the cry that all we now collect is needed for education, for sinking funds, for pensions and claims, for ships, for guns, for bonds, such as the banks want; in short, for anything that will keep the high protective tariff up to its present rate.

I regard this newly developed affection for the Southern people on the part of the most ultra Republicans as more dangerous than the violent assaults they made upon them, their institutions, and their property during all the years of reconstruction. Ten years of war failed to vanquish the Trojans, but Troy fell when her leaders accepted the fatal gift from the Greeks. Ten years of oppression, unparalleled in modern history, marked by every atrocity that human malignity could devise, stands as a monument of Radical tyranny in the South. I fear their proffered gifts more than I did all their persecution. The mailed hand is now concealed by the silken glove. Their hatred of all the white people of that region is as intense to-day as it was when they enfranchised their former slaves and disfranchised them; drove the negroes into the loyal leagues, under Freedmen's Bureau agents and carpet-bag emissaries, backed by Federal bayonets, in order to complete the degradation of the dominant white race. When I think of all these things, and hear the same men now prating about the necessity of intelligence controlling the ballot-box in these States, yet reporting constitutional amendments to invest all the intensely ignorant negro women of the South with the right to vote, while professing an anxious desire to promote intelligent suffrage among the Southern people, I do not believe in the sincerity of their professions.

I regard this measure as a Pandora's box, filled with nothing but evils. It is the entering-wedge to absolute Federal domination over education in the States. The present bill does not profess half that it means, but it paves the way for all. Mixed schools will be the first demand. That claim once asserted, there will be strife between the races, which will be carefully fostered and encouraged, so as to alienate the colored race from the white and give the Republican party another opportunity to consolidate their vote, which they have lost by failing to furnish the "forty acres of land and a mule" and other like promises or to make good the swindles of the Freedman's Bank. They feel that they have now lost their hold on the negro vote, which they claim as their exclusive property. None of the evils they predicted befell that race when the Democratic party resumed control of the Southern States. The force bill failed; the civil-rights bill has been declared unconstitutional; the Danville riot and the Copiah murders have failed, notwithstanding the flourish of trumpets with which Senatorial committees have paraded them, to give promise of a successful revival of the bloody shirt. They know that some pretense for the exercise of Federal authority over Southern internal affairs must be devised or the negro vote is gone. Education is the most plausible, and they will soon make it the most effectual, means of producing discord and furnishing excuses for the exercise of Federal authority, while it will enable them to get rid of an immense amount of surplus revenue and prevent a reduction of tariff taxation.

It amazes me to hear gentlemen express gratitude for the generosity exhibited in the offer to pass this bill. Generosity, indeed! This Government is a pauper. Every dollar it proposes to give by this bill was needlessly wrung by the most costly and cunning if not the most oppressive form of taxation out of the needs and wants of the laboring masses. Every dollar it is proposed to donate cost the labor of the country $5 before it reached the Treasury. Wealth and property as such are exempt from all burdens, and when a demand is rising from one end of the country to the other for relief and reduction of taxes until it can no longer be resisted, a flank movement is made under pretense of providing for education in the South so as to absorb one hundred and five millions and thus keep up taxation in the interest of the protected classes. The distribution is based upon illiteracy now. It may be on the color line next session. It may be confined to mixed schools in a year. If gentlemen who are so devoted to the South will allow them to import cotton and other machinery duty free, so that their infant industries may compete with those of New England, which have been protected for twenty-five years, and if they will return to those States, to be applied annually in payment of State taxes, the $64,000,000 which was wrongfully taken from them by an unconstitutional tax on the raw cotton exported, they will build up their own industries, establish and maintain schools for whites and blacks, and develop an intelligence, prosperity, and independence which the "soup-house" system proposed by this bill will never accomplish.

I propose now—it may possibly be the only chance afforded me—to lay before the Senate and the people the iniquities of the present tariff system of taxation, which it is the main object of the Republican advocates of this bill to maintain and perpetuate by squandering money on anything that is plausible. I shall make plain the unjust methods by which the so-called conference committee of the last Congress imposed it upon the country by the confession of the Republican leaders themselves, and I shall appeal to the country to reverse their action. In the mean time I shall insist in regard to this and all other schemes that the Democratic party owes it to itself and to the tax-payers of the country to resist all such temptations and to work with an eye single to the reduction of revenue to the point needed for public purposes only, leaving all other expenditures for education as well as for all else to be provided for by the States and people as they may think their interests and necessities require.

I am glad that the two great political organizations of the country will soon have to appeal to the people to decide what our future policy shall be in that regard. I hope that each will state its position so plainly that there can be no misunderstanding or charge of double dealing through misleading or obscure phrases.

Honesty is the best policy. I am one of those who believe that the danger ahead, in this Republic of equal States and citizens with their various and conflicting interests, lies in the overshadowing centralizing power and tendency of the Federal Government, operating especially through its taxing power, with an overflowing Treasury and constantly increasing patronage, used as it is to perpetuate the supremacy of the party in power. And one of the alarming signs of the times is the avidity with which representatives of States and localities seize upon any plausible pretext for conferring authority on the Federal Government when it proposes to expend money in the interest of their immediate constituents.

This is not a paternal government, where rulers are masters. Our temporary rulers have no hereditary or divine right. It is a government of and by the people, through paid representatives acting for them. An unlimited power of taxation means an unlimited power of demoralization and corruption. I believe that taxation in all its forms should be strictly limited to the wants of an economically administered federal government; and that whenever we impose taxes on the people to give special privileges or bounties to favored classes, or to distribute surplus revenue, unnecessarily collected, even for education in the States, which is the most plausible of all the suggestions presented, or for any other purpose, which States and individuals ought to and but for Federal interference would provide for, we are encouraging extravagance, fostering corruption, destroying individual and local self-reliance, impairing the manhood, virtue, and personal independence of the people, and usurping powers which form no part of the great purposes specified in our carefully guarded Federal Constitution, which limits the taxing power as follows:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

That provision evidently means that the power to impose taxes was granted for broad but clearly defined purposes. It was given in order to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States. All other and more limited objects, however needful or meritorious, were left to be provided for and supported by the several States and the people, in whom and to whom all powers not granted to the Federal Government were expressly reserved.

I believe that the Democratic party stands upon and proposes to legislate on these principles, limiting the taxing power to the purposes set forth in the Constitution. These principles will sooner or later control the policy of the country. This people are proud of their Constitution and jealous of their individual rights of personal and political equality. They believe in local self-government; they know that they can manage their own affairs in their families, churches, school houses and districts, townships, counties, and States in all regards more efficiently and more economically than Congress can, and they want no interference from Washington with their matters. All they ask or desire Congress to do is to maintain the honor and dignity of the country at home and abroad; to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States; to see to it that all our citizens shall have fair play and full protection in their commercial dealings and contests with foreigners and with the people of other States. They did not propose to trust even their own Congress with the power to impose burdens on their domestic relations or dealings on any pretext; therefore they established absolute free trade among all the States and all the people thereof, and they prohibited the imposition of taxes in any form on the goods they might see fit to export. They knew that the power to tax conferred the power to destroy; therefore they limited that power strictly to necessary public purposes, to taxes that should be uniform throughout the United States, which when collected should be applied for the prescribed purposes of paying the debts and providing for the common defense and general welfare of the whole country. Nine-tenths of our people would be shocked if they realized that their representatives had used the taxing power to enrich favored classes at their expense or had given to foreign nations a monopoly of the carrying trade of the ocean, so that we are now prostrate and at their mercy, with hardly a ship, a sailor, or a gun to do our work or defend ourselves against our enemies. They know that prohibition is protection run mad; is, in short, the most odious and oppressive form of taxation, especially when imposed to promote the interests of a favored few by imposing burdens on the wants and needs of the laboring poor. Nine-tenths of them would assert with most pronounced emphasis that the only legitimate exercise of the power of taxation by Congress is to raise the revenue needed to support the Federal Government. That amount they will cheerfully pay in any form their representatives may think best to impose it, provided always that they are satisfied it is honestly imposed in the public interest and applied for the promotion of the general welfare. They recognize the fact that taxes are burdens to be imposed only for public purposes and not as private bounties. They know that all the judicial tribunals in the land, from the Supreme Court of the United States to the humblest court in every State, have invariably so held in language too pronounced to admit of doubt or uncertainty.

No decision of the Supreme Court is better understood or more cordially indorsed than that delivered by Justice Miller in the case of The Loan Association vs. Topeka (20 Wallace, 657), in which he clearly defines the limitations of the taxing power, saying, among other things:

> The power to tax is therefore the strongest, the most pervading of all the powers of the Government, reaching directly or indirectly to all classes of the people. It was said by Chief-Justice Marshall, in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, that the power to tax is the power to destroy. A striking instance of the truth of the proposition is seen in the fact that the existing tax of 10 per cent. imposed by the United States on the circulation of all other banks than the national banks drove out of existence every State bank of circulation within a year or two after its passage. This power can as readily be employed against one class of individuals and in favor of another, so as to ruin the one class and give unlimited wealth and prosperity to the other, if there is no implied limitation of the uses for which the power may be exercised.
> To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen, and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build private fortunes, is none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation. This is not legislation. It is a decree under legislative forms.
> Nor is it taxation. A "tax," says Webster's Dictionary, "is a rate or sum of money assessed on the person or property of a citizen by government for the use of the nation or state." "Taxes are burdens or charges imposed by the legislature upon persons or property to raise money for public purposes."
> Coulter, J., in Northern Liberties vs. St. John's Church, says, very forcibly, "I think the common mind has everywhere taken in the understanding that taxes are a public imposition, levied by authority of the government for the purpose of carrying on the government in all its machinery and operations; that they are imposed for a public purpose."

In that case he calls attention to a very large number of authorities. Judge Miller says further:

> If it be said that a benefit results to the local public of a town by establishing manufactures, the same may be said of any other business or pursuit which employs capital or labor. The merchant, the mechanic, the inn-keeper, the banker, the builder, the steamboat-owner, are equally promoters of the public good and equally deserving the aid of the citizens by forced contributions. No line can be drawn in favor of the manufacturer which would not open the coffers of the public treasury to the importunities of two-thirds of the business men of the city or town.

I understand these to be the principles of the Democratic party and the meaning of its platforms relative to taxation. We propose to maintain a revenue tariff. We are neither free-traders nor prohibitionists; both extremes are equally fatal to the raising of revenue.

Free trade under the provisions of the Constitution means direct taxation, to be apportioned among the States in proportion to population as ascertained by the last preceding census. That, as the census report shows, would require each man in Alabama to pay over $8 on the assessed value of the property in the State for every dollar paid by a citizen in Rhode Island on the assessed value of the property in that State, which would be more unequal and therefore more unjust than indirect taxation now is, even under our present oppressive tariff system.

We know that with all internal taxes abolished except upon distilled spirits, malt liquors, and tobacco, somewhere near $150,000,000 a year must be raised by tariff taxation for needed revenue. No one proposes to reimpose taxes on any article now free from tax or duty, no matter how fruitful a source of revenue it might be. All we expect or propose to do is to reform existing abuses and reduce the burdens now imposed by law, tariff duties being still maintained at war rates, while the burdens of internal taxation, to compensate for which they were avowedly increased temporarily while war was flagrant, have long since been removed.

Nine-tenths of the dutiable articles now imported, perhaps more than that in value, correspond with articles produced or manufactured in some portion of this vast country, so that the home producer can sell his product to the home consumer, if it is as good as the imported article, at the foreign price of the article imported with the tariff tax and freights added. He has no competition from foreign goods if he asks less for his than that. Combinations among home manufacturers maintain the prices they charge home consumers nearly up to that point. Therefore no revenue tariff can fail to afford incidental protection or advantages, call it what you will, to the home producer of articles similar and equal to those imported.

I have no doubt that some day the people of this country will demand that a part of the necessary revenues of the Government shall be raised by a tax on incomes. Wealth, as such, is now untaxed; labor is heavily burdened by taxation on all it needs. It is a disgrace to our legislation that the millionaires of this country should pay no more to support the Federal Government than the men who drive their coaches do.

If education must be adopted as part of the obligations of the Federal Government, let a tax on incomes in excess of $5,000 a year be imposed and set apart as a special fund for that purpose. Even the English aristocracy do not now dare to ask an exemption of their incomes from taxation and demand that the needs and wants of labor shall supply the revenue; yet it is boldly asserted in this Republic by the protectionists that all internal taxes on whisky and tobacco must be removed, and that the present protective-tariff system of taxation must be maintained and all needed revenue raised by it, as though taxation on the necessaries of life was a blessing and a boon maintained in the interest of the American laborer. While, in truth, by this system, everything he and his family must have is increased in price so that the purchasing power of his wages is reduced 40 per cent., yet this is claimed to be for his protection, and specific rates of duty are substituted for "ad valorem" rates, so that the cigar worth 1 cent pays the same duty as one worth 10. The wines of the Rhine, worth 30 cents a gallon, pay the same as the madeira, worth $5. The blanket worth $1 pays the same as that worth $5, and so on throughout the list, discriminating always against the poor in favor of the rich in the interest of American labor!

I am glad that the two great parties of the country have at last placed themselves in a position before the people which requires them to avow and defend their principles on the question of taxation, which overshadows all others—a tariff for protection, with all its consequences, being the battle-cry of the Republicans, and a tariff for revenue, limited to the wants of the Government, being inscribed on the Democratic banner. It may break up some old party associations; there may be a new alignment in some sections; be it so; the great body of each party will move on to victory or defeat on that issue.

The two propositions now pending before the Senate relative to our merchant marine, which is made a special order, open the battle fairly, one proposing protection and subsidy, the other free ships and the removal of restrictions to trade and commerce. We may be defeated here, but we will renew the contest next fall on a broader field.

I admit that we have not been able to present a very satisfactory bill for relief from tariff taxation in the House of Representatives, and the Constitution prohibits us from introducing an original tax bill in the Senate; yet the House bill has forced the Republican protectionists to avow that they oppose any and all reductions, that they maintain and propose to perpetuate the existing tariff; and while there is over $100,000,000 of surplus revenue beyond even the appropriations they dare venture to make, no relief will be permitted, no matter what interests may suffer by the excessive taxation, because protection up to the present point must be maintained and all sorts of wild schemes to squander the surplus must be devised. The "Morrison bill" has at least succeeded in developing the position of its enemies. The Republican party has advanced its lines up to the tariff-for-protection stronghold slowly and cautiously, keeping its line of retreat open for a long line, until it now thinks that it is securely intrenched and can defy all its enemies. Its course illustrates the truth of what the historian of the Middle Ages said after he had traced, step by step, the progress of centralization and paternal government in Europe over the ruins of popular liberty and right.

> We find in the history of all usurping governments time changes anomaly into system and injury into right. Examples beget custom, and custom ripens into law, and the doubtful precedents of one generation become the fundamental maxims of another.

The present position of the Republican party is not only absolutely subversive of the principles and policy of the founders of the Republic and of all the statesmen who have been regarded as the champions of American industries, but also of the pledges given and the doctrines announced in the Congress of the United States by the present Republican leaders time and again, as I will abundantly prove. To do so I must refer to the records of the country. The history of the American Colonies was, as is well known, one long-continued struggle against the high protective tariff, the restrictions on trade and commerce, and the prohibitions on their shipping interests which England imposed on them, and in favor of free trade, free ships, and sailors' rights. Taxation of a very mild type, as compared with ours, was the spark that exploded the magazine and resulted in converting the Colonies into free and independent States. Mr. Burke knew the character and temper of the American colonists, and he warned England in Parliament not to press them to the wall. He said:

> In other countries the people, more simple and of a less mercurial cast, judge of an ill principle in government only by an actual grievance; here they anticipate the evil and judge of the pressure of the grievance by the badness of the principle. They augur misgovernment at a distance and snuff the approach of tyranny in every tainted breeze.

Hon. David A. Wells speaks thus of the principal causes which led to the American Revolution and of the men who were leaders in it:

> By the statute of 1650 the export and import trade of the English colonies was restricted to English or colony built ships; but by the statute of 1663 nothing was allowed to be imported into a British plantation except in an English-built ship "whereof the master and three-fourths of the crew are English."
> The enactment of arbitrary laws on the part of Great Britain to prevent her American colonists from freely participating in the carrying trade and commerce of the ocean was, however, a sore grievance, and ultimately, as is well known, constituted one of the prime causes of the American Revolution. They were, furthermore, from the very first either openly or secretly resisted and evaded, and under their influence the colonists became a nation of law-breakers. Nine-tenths of their merchants were smugglers. One-quarter of all the signers of the Declaration of Independence were bred to commerce, to the command of ships and to contraband trade. Hancock, Trumbull (Brother Jonathan), and Hamilton were all known to be cognizant of contraband transactions and approved of them. Hancock was the prince of contraband traders, and, with John Adams as his counsel, was appointed for trial before the admiralty court in Boston at the exact hour of the shedding of blood at Lexington in a suit for $500,000 penalties alleged to have been incurred by him as a smuggler.
> Every evasion of such statutes was therefore, in their view, a blow in favor of liberty. Hence also the origin of that count in the indictment against the King of Great Britain embodied in the Declaration of Independence, "of cutting off our trade with all parts of the world."

Such were the views of the men who a hundred years ago were accounted the wisest of American patriots and statesmen. But nowadays to adopt the principles of Hancock, Trumbull, and Hamilton, to advocate the free ownership and employment of ships, and to oppose the enactment of statutes the avowed purpose of which is to restrict or prevent the freedom of international trade and commerce is to invite the accusation of being enemies to the industry of the country and in league with foreign nations to impoverish our own people.

Mr. Wells adds:

In the treaty of commerce entered into between France and the United States in 1778 the commissioners of the two nations, Franklin, Deane, Lee, and Gerard, evidently determined to attempt to inaugurate a more generous policy and establish a precedent for freer and better commercial relations between different countries than had hitherto prevailed. It was accordingly agreed in the treaty in question to avoid "all those burdensome prejudices which are usually sources of debate, embarrassment and discontent," and to take as the "basis of their agreement the most perfect equality and reciprocity." And they further stated the principle which they had adopted as a guide in their negotiations to be that of "founding the advantages of commerce solely upon reciprocal utility and the just rules of free intercourse."

During the debate on the Tariff Commission in this body I had the honor to lay before the Senate a letter from Thomas Jefferson to Edmund Randolph, written from Annapolis, then the seat of government, December 16, 1783, which shows that the American commissioners proposed in the definitive treaty of peace with England absolute free trade and unrestricted intercourse between the high contracting parties, and that the proposition was rejected. This is his language:

The definitive treaty had been received by the President some time ago and a joint letter from our ministers. This gave us an account of the various propositions and steps taken on both sides in the negotiation which preceded the definitive treaty. Mr. Hartley was the British negotiator with America. He was well disposed, but his zeal for systems friendly to us constantly exceeded his powers to agree to them. Our ministers proposed a free intercourse between every part of the British dominions and the United States, having the rights of their chartered companies. Mr. H. approved of it, but his court declined assenting.

All the French spoliation claims before 1800, which have so often passed either the House or the Senate and both twice being vetoed by Presidents Polk and Pierce, grew out of attacks upon our commerce, which was then assuming sufficient importance to excite the jealousy and animosity of France, who depredated upon it in plain violation of her treaty obligations, while the war of 1812, caused by English retaliatory orders in council against Napoleon's Berlin decrees, was waged successfully for free seas, free trade, and sailors' rights. Up to that time the leading nations of the world were seeking to destroy each other; then protective tariffs, embargoes, restrictions, and prohibitions were the rule everywhere. The American colonies had not been allowed to develop their manufacturing industries; they came out of the war for their independence bankrupt and exhausted; England was mistress of the seas, and prohibited them from trading with her or her colonies except upon almost impossible terms. After they became United States their condition was one of constant peril. A prosperous republic was then regarded as a standing menace to the institutions of the Old World; they were liable to insult or attack from any quarter by land or sea; treaties with them were lightly regarded; they had to become self-sustaining and ready for war at any time. Of course they had to prepare for all emergencies in time of peace, and they were compelled, as best they could, to raise the necessary revenues for their support with very limited credit, while fostering and developing their then truly infant industries. They could not allow foreign nations, with capital and machinery, to crush out the efforts of their own people to manufacture needed goods, and then withdraw supplies whenever they could find a pretext for war, while the nations that proposed to furnish manufactures cheaper than they could then be produced here either closed their ports against American products or excluded them by onerous discriminatory duties. Self-preservation is the first law of nature. Supplies for war they knew must be provided in time of peace; yet under all these circumstances so careful were the men who framed the Constitution not to cripple trade and commerce beyond their absolute necessities, that the average of the first tariff tax was only about 8 per cent. ad valorem. All the powers of Europe combined would not now think of invading our soil. We need not prepare for war, yet we maintain a tariff tax of over 40 per cent.

The country and its resources had grown and developed immensely before the war of 1812, but that struggle by sea and land with the most formidable naval power in the world required taxation to be increased to the highest possible point, the net ordinary expenditures for the five years from 1812 to 1816, inclusive, being $126,366,500, while for the twenty-one years from 1791 to 1812 they had amounted to only $100,822,000.

Yet in 1815 Mr. Clay, who is constantly paraded before the country by the protectionists as their great champion, in the debate on the tariff then proposed to be increased in order to raise the money to pay off the war debt, only urged a tax on imports of 25 per cent. instead of 20 per cent.

"In three years," he said, "we could judge of the ability of our establishments to furnish these articles as cheaply as they were obtained from abroad, and could then legislate with the lights of experience." He believed that "three years would be sufficient to place our manufactures on this desirable footing."

Nearly seventy years have elapsed since then, yet 41 per cent. average tariff tax is maintained in time of profound peace, almost at the highest war rates, with over $100,000,000 of surplus annually flowing into the Treasury beyond even the present extravagant, not to say wasteful, expenditures, and all efforts to reduce these taxes to something like a revenue standard are denounced by protectionists as ruinous to American industries.

Mr. Clay had no such ideas as are now maintained by Senators on the other side of this Chamber. In the great debate in the Senate in 1842, while defending the compromise tariff of 1832, under which all duties were brought to a uniform rate of 20 per cent., Mr. Clay said:

If the compromise act had not been adopted the whole system of protection would have been swept by the board by the preponderating influence of the illustrious man then at the head of the Government (General Jackson) at the very next session after its enactment.

Yet General Jackson is sometimes quoted as a protectionist.

Again Mr. Clay said:

As to the compromise, he had already said that it was his purpose, as long as he should remain in the Senate, to maintain that the original principles of the act should be carried out faithfully and honestly; and if in providing for an adequate revenue for an economical administration of the Government they could at the same time afford incidental protection, he would be happy if both of these objects could be accomplished.

Again—

There was, he said, one common ground on which all parties could unite—that of providing an adequate revenue for the administration of the Government. If in doing this incidental protection can be afforded to home industry, he invoked every patriot to unite in effecting that object.

These views of Mr. Clay must sound very much like he would be a Democrat if he was here now to the admirers of and colaborers with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], who, in a carefully considered speech, delivered in the Senate February 10, 1882, after berating soundly the Democratic party for its opposition to the doctrine of protection, added:

And yet, sir, right in the teeth of these savage denunciations, fidelity to truth compels me to declare that I am a protectionist from principle. If there was no public debt, no interest to pay, no pension-list, no Army and no Navy to support, I still should oppose free trade and its twin sister, tariff for revenue only, and favor protective duties.

The leading protectionists had previously met in convention at Chicago and resolved unanimously—

That the American people intend hereafter to keep this market for themselves, that the tariff must be protective.

The Senator from Maine, while bolder and more outspoken than the older and more cunning leaders of his party, only voices the real sentiments and purposes of the organization of which he is a distinguished representative. They may not state it as frankly and as honestly in their platform when they meet at Chicago as he does—the farmers of the West might rebel—but they will carry out his programme no matter what they profess, as every combination of protected interests thoroughly understands. Of course these taxes are not avowedly imposed for their benefit, but in the interest of American labor, and to enable them to increase the wages of their workmen.

The Senator from Maine presented the issue on his side fairly in that speech. Speaking for myself, as I do not propose to control anybody, I hope the Democracy will meet the protectionists with equal frankness, and avow that they will stand or fall on the principles of a revenue tariff, limited to the wants of an economically administered government, and adjusted, as nearly as may be after this lapse of time, upon the principles of the tariff of 1846; reaching the rates of that day by slow reductions, so as not to destroy any interest or industry which has been even unnaturally or artificially stimulated by the extravagant bounties bestowed by the present oppressive war tariff. I propose to introduce Republican authority in support of my position, and show that a gradual return to the revenue tariff of 1846 would not be a revolutionary measure, and we can soon return to it if we do not squander our surplus revenue and create new and heretofore unknown sources of expenditure by educational and other schemes of at least doubtful constitutionality, as there can be no question that with the improved machinery and methods of to-day there is less than half the human labor employed to produce the same products now that was needed thirty years ago, and consequently there is that much less need for protection, as it will hardly be contended that machinery and patents need it.

The distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], now a leading member of the Finance Committee and chairman of the Committee of Appropriations of this body, made a very able speech in the House of Representatives on the 24th and 25th of March, 1870, he being then a prominent member of the Committee on Ways and Means, in which he spoke of the tariff of 1846 as follows:

The tariff of 1846, although confessedly and professedly a tariff for revenue, was, so far as regards all the great interests of the country, as perfect a tariff as any that we have ever had. If any interest was depressed under the tariff of 1846, it was the iron interest. I do not believe that this interest, as compared with other interests, had sufficient advantage under that tariff; yet when we compare the growth of the country from 1840 to 1850 with the growth of the country from 1850 to 1860—the latter decade being entirely under the tariff of 1846 or the amended and greatly reduced tariff of 1857—we find that the increase in our wealth between 1850 and 1860 was equivalent to 126 per cent., while it was only 64 per cent. between 1840 and 1850, four years of which decade were under the tariff of 1842, known as a high protective tariff, but the average rate of which was about 70 per cent. below the existing rate, or 27 per cent. under the tariff of 1842 as against 44 per cent. upon all importations under the present tariff. Our industries were generally prosperous in 1860, with the exception, possibly, of the iron interest. This was the statement of Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, on this floor during the discussion of the tariff of 1864. With regard to the condition of the steel industry in 1860, the steel manufacturers in 1866, memorializing Congress for increase of duties on steel, stated that—

"It was reserved for Pittsburgh to bring about the first substantial and enduring success in the year of 1860; and encouraged by our example numerous establishments have sprung into existence, as already indicated in this paper. This shows that under the revenue tariff of 1857, which imposed only an ad valorem duty of 12 per cent. on steel, a substantial success was achieved in the steel manufacture in 1860. I have read the language of the memorial."

I regard that indorsement of the act of 1846 and of the principles of a revenue tariff as entitled to greater consideration than anything I could say. Hon. Robert J. Walker, Mr. Polk's Secretary of the Treasury, who framed the tariff of 1846, addressed a letter to the people of the United States on the 30th of November, 1867, in which he took occasion to refer to the tariff of 1846, and contrast its principles and provisions with those of the present system. After showing what amount he thought would be sufficient for the wants of the Government economically administered, he said:

This revenue of $244,000,000 a year, as a maximum, I would derive from three sources alone:

1. By a tariff for revenue.
2. By an excise on wines, malt and spirituous liquors, and tobacco; abolishing all other internal taxation.
3. By a tax on our national banks, based upon just and fair equivalents.

* * * * * * * *

A tariff for revenue, as experience has shown, instead of depressing improves all industrial pursuits, including manufactures, and vastly augments the wealth of the country. Under the tariff of 1846, as shown by the census, our wealth increased from 1850 to 1860 126.45 per cent.; whereas from 1840 to 1850 the increase was only 64 per cent.; from 1830 to 1840, 42 per cent., and from 1820 to 1830, 41 per cent. So, also, from 1850 to 1860 our agricultural products increased 95 per cent, and our manufactures 87 per cent., being in both cases nearly double any preceding ratio of increase. So, also, our exports, imports, and revenue nearly tripled in the same period of time, and our domestic trade rose nearly in the same ratio. This augmented ratio is not the result of increase of population, which from 1850 to 1860 was less than 36 per cent. The Irish famine was supposed by my opponents to account for the increase the first year, although the decreased price paid abroad that year for our cotton nearly equaled the additional sum paid by England for our breadstuffs and provisions. But the next year and the next, before any gold had reached here from California, our exports and revenue went on augmenting in a corresponding ratio, rising in eight years from $22,000,000 under the tariff of 1842 to $64,000,000 under the tariff of 1846.

I think Mr. Walker answers fully the boast of the great feat accomplished by the Morrill tariff, by "transforming ad valorem duties into specific," in the following sentence:

There is another insuperable objection to the specific system, namely, that it unnecessarily and invariably taxes labor vastly more than capital, and the poor in a much greater proportion than the rich, upon the goods consumed. Under the system of specific duties of so much per pound, or yard, or gallon, &c., the specific duty is the same. The rich, who purchase the costly article bearing only the same specific duty, pay, in proportion to value, less than one-half what is paid by the poor, who purchase a cheaper and less costly article. If we take all the costly articles purchased by the rich bearing under the present tariff the same specific duty as the inferior article bought by the poor, we will find the difference against them exceeds $20,000,000 a year. Such is the immense additional tax exacted from labor under the system of specific duties.

Think of the injustice of a system under which the laboring man pays 90 per cent. tariff tax on the only kind of blankets he can afford to buy, while the Senator and his lordly friends pay less than 60 per cent. tax on such as they use and in like proportion for all else. How long would a law stand in the State of New York that taxes the residence of Mr. Vanderbilt or Mr. Stewart, worth $2,000,000, no more than the residence of their coachman, worth $2,000? That is specific taxation. Ad valorem, or a fair per cent. tax on each according to its value, is the system adopted by the American people in all their State governmental affairs, and is the only just system. Mr. Walker but expresses the views of all disinterested intelligent men when he says:

Our present system of taxation is the most onerous ever imposed upon any people, and is utterly destructive of the prosperity of our country.

Our present tariff is also most unequal, oppressive, and unjust. It is grievously onerous upon agriculture, commerce, navigation, ship-building, &c. * * * The present tariff, besides the tax of $150,000,000 a year upon imports, the duties on which are paid by the people into the Treasury in gold, exacts another tax of at least $350,000,000 a year in the enhanced prices of rival protected domestic articles. This can be readily proved by comparing the prices current in gold of such domestic articles with the prices of similar articles produced in other countries. Thus, the tariff taxes the people of the United States to the extent of $500,000,000 a year, of which only $150,000,000 goes into the Treasury, and the remaining $350,000,000 go into the pockets of the protected classes.

Mr. Walker understood too well the real purpose of the clamor about protection to American labor and the wages of operatives to be deceived by it. He knew that the $350,000,000 of taxes taken from the people which did not reach the Treasury went into the pockets of the protected classes and not into the pockets of their operatives. He made a great report to Congress on the 11th day of December, 1848, which I wish every laboring man in the United States could read, whether he works in a factory or on a farm. Even Senators would be benefited by its perusal.

On the subject of specific and ad valorem duties Mr. Walker says:

If the importation of protected articles would rapidly decrease when the foreign were high in price and specific duties operated as a protection, under the tariff of 1842 from 41 to 243 per cent. (per Table H, compiled from Treasury returns in 1844), what must not have been the decline of importation and revenue when the foreign article fell, as it has in many cases, 50 per cent., bringing up the specific duty from 41 to 82 and from 243 to 486 per cent.? This fact illustrates another objection to the specific duty, namely, that although it professes to be stationary, it is in fact constantly augmenting from reduced prices of foreign articles. Experience proves that from improved machinery, new inventions, and reduced cost of production the foreign articles are constantly diminishing in price, while, the specific duty remaining unchanged, it is continually increasing in ratio as an equivalent ad valorem, and the protection augmenting every year. Thus, if the price of sugar was 6 cents a pound and the duty 3 cents, it would be equal to 50 per cent. ad valorem; but if the price of sugar fell to 3 cents the duty would have risen to 100 per cent. ad valorem, thus doubling the protection and continually augmenting with decreasing foreign prices until the duty becomes prohibitory and the revenue on such articles disappears; whereas the ad valorem bears under all changes of price the same exact ratio to the cost of the foreign fabric, and therefore is the most just and equal, as also necessarily insuring a larger revenue.

In this aspect of the case, the objections to the specific duties as a permanent system, with a view to revenue, are insuperable, while their unjust operation upon labor, in imposing so much higher duties as an equivalent ad valorem on the cheaper than the more costly qualities of goods, can not be successfully defended.

* * * * * * *

That which our manufacturers now desire is what they regard as moderate duties, made specific in certain cases. But these specific duties will, as has been shown, be found constantly augmenting in ratio under the operation of the general principle by which the foreign article is continually tending to a diminished price; whereas the ad valorem, always bearing the same proportion to the value of the import, is therefore always the most just and equal and yielding the largest revenue. The augmented revenue under the tariff of 1846 has proved that ad valorem duties can be fairly assessed and collected.

We know that the clamor now raised about frauds and undervaluations is simply a means of securing higher specific protective duties, as was well illustrated in the case of the now somewhat notorious Bessemer steel-rail specific duty of $28 a ton, which was equal to 45 per cent. when imposed, but by English and German inventions and processes then known here by the parties interested, who had secured the patents, but concealed from Congress and the public until the specific rate instead of the ad valorem was secured to the pets of Congress, the $28 per ton specific soon became 110 per cent. ad valorem, while home competition, so much talked about, had nothing to do with the reduction, as the home product continued to be sold at the foreign price, with the tariff tax added, to our people in Texas and elsewhere, or $28 a ton more than it was sold for across the bridge at Laredo, in Mexico, after being transported in bond through the United States. The truth is that with honest custom-house officials and commercial agents there can be no serious frauds by undervaluation. There were none under Mr. Walker's administration, and if the party now in power can not obtain them, they had better retire and let us try.

Returning to Mr. Walker's report: In speaking of the general principles of tariff taxation and its effect on the wages of labor, he says:

The adoption by each nation of high tariffs is a war upon the labor of the world. As labor is more productive, capital is more rapidly increased and wages augmented; yet the tariff, by compelling each nation to employ a portion of its industry in articles which can be produced more cheaply abroad and refusing the exchange, forces labor throughout the world into less profitable pursuits, and as a consequence diminishes the products of labor as well as its wages. Thus, if silks can be manufactured at a less cost in Europe, and breadstuffs more cheaply in this country, and by high tariffs we prevent the import of silks here, while by similar tariffs abroad or their inability to purchase from us because we will not take their fabrics in exchange our breadstuffs are excluded to a greater or less extent from their markets and their silks from our own, labor in both countries is forced into less productive pursuits and both parties have sustained a loss. International tariffs diminish the aggregate value of the profits of labor to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars every year and reduce correspondingly the wages of labor. It would be most useful to examine the tariffs of all nations and ascertain how much labor in each is thereby diverted into less productive pursuits. These tables have never yet been collected; but if of the thousand million people of the earth the labor of 200,000,000 is thus rendered less profitable to the extent of 1 cent a day for each, the annual loss would be $600,000,000.

Man was commanded to labor; but he was permitted by his Maker to employ his industry in each country in those pursuits for which it was best suited, and where his labor would be less severe and better rewarded. But the laws of man, by high duties, diminish the products of his industry, thus augment his hours of toil, and deprive him of the time designed by his Creator for the acquisition of knowledge. These laws also, while diminishing the wealth of nations, produce discord between them, each by high tariffs proclaiming war upon the industry of all others. Under free trade each nation will profit by the labor of every other; each will employ its industry in those pursuits for which it is best adapted, and the surplus of each will be thus exchanged with the others by a reciprocal commerce beneficial to all parties. The true industrial interests of nations are identical, and in exchanging with each other the products most cheaply produced by each, labor everywhere benefits labor, man his brother man, and nations each other, and their only antagonism is introduced by human legislation. The doctrine of free trade is the petition of labor to employ itself everywhere in those pursuits best adapted by nature to every country and yielding therefor in each the largest products and highest wages. It looks upon our race everywhere as friends, as brethren, as equal in rights, and united in interest and destiny. Rightly understood, there is perfect unity of interest between man and man, and nation and nation, and between capital and labor.

* * * * * * * *

We see the benefits of reciprocal free trade among all the States of this Union; although their wages, products, and fabrics are as various as those of separate nations, yet all the States find it their true interest to admit freely the products of each other. The benefits of this unrestricted reciprocal commerce constitute the great bond of interest, constantly augmenting, which keeps together the various parts; but if the protective doctrine be true, it would be the real interest of each and all of these States to impose duties upon similar products in others for the protection of the people of each State. Yet, clear as is this proof of the benefits of reciprocal free trade between the States of this Union, the principle, as a question of political economy, is the same extended to other states not united with us under the same government. The difference in their political institutions can not affect the great principles of commerce. The local laws of Ohio and Louisiana, of Mississippi and Massachusetts, are more variant in some respects than those of many other states beyond the limits of the Union. Now, while we acknowledge the benefits of reciprocal free trade between these four States, thus differing in their local institutions, wages, and products, the protectionists deny that it would be beneficial to establish reciprocal unrestricted commerce with other states beyond our limits. Yet variant forms of government can make no difference as to the reciprocal benefits of commerce. If free trade be beneficial among all republican states it might at least be extended to them, although monarchies were excluded; but none will maintain that nations should restrict their commerce with each other because they differ in their form of government. Although governments may differ, we are of one race throughout the globe; the toiling millions who inhabit it have one interest; and as a question of political economy the benefits of free trade must be the same, whether extended to states beyond or within the limits of the same government; and each State, though separated hereafter by some catastrophe from every other State, would be alike still benefited by reciprocal free trade among the whole, for their commercial interests would not change with the separation from the confederacy.

Whenever the laws of nature are beyond the reach of man there is perfect order—the direction of Almighty power; but whenever man can disturb these laws discord and injury are sure to ensue. The earth, the sun, and countless systems wheeling through universal space move onward in perfect order and beauty; but even the harmony of the spheres would be disturbed if the legislation of man could interfere and arrest the laws of nature. The natural laws which control trade between nations and regulate the relations between capital and profits on the one hand and wages and labor on the other are perfect and harmonious, and the laws of man which would effect a change are always injurious. The laws of political economy are fixed and certain. Let them alone is all that is required of man; let all international exchanges of products move as freely in their orbits as the heavenly bodies in their spheres, and their order and harmony will be as perfect and their results as beneficial as is every movement under the laws of nature when undisturbed by the errors and interference of man.

If labor is dear here and low abroad, in exchange of products we get more of theirs for a smaller amount of ours, and gain by the exchange. The cheapness of foreign labor is an argument in favor of exchange with them. Thus, if we concede as to linens that Europe, from cheap labor, could afford to sell two yards for what one would cost here, it would be to our interest to purchase from them at the reduced price. But according to the protective theory the cheaper the foreign labor and the lower the price of its products the more should we exclude them by higher rates of duty. In the absence of duties we will exchange our surplus products for their cheaper fabrics, and our labor being applied to the production of articles thus exchanged abroad, wages will be enhanced here by obtaining more extended markets for our products and getting for them a greater quantity of useful articles at lower prices. In the absence of tariffs the division of labor would be according to the laws of nature in each nation, and the surplus of each would thus be exchanged among the whole, each employing its labor only in the most productive pursuits, and therefore the aggregate profits would be largest. If labor were so low in any foreign country that they could furnish us goods at almost nominal prices, and these cheap articles were such as we wanted here, it would be our interest to purchase them in exchange for our products, and the cheaper the foreign articles the greater would be our gain in the exchange. It is a strange objection to the purchaser of foreign articles that the price is too low.

* * * * * * *

The argument that we must encourage our infant industries was always fallacious, for they would encourage themselves as soon as the country was adapted to them. But are they now infant manufactures? We have called them so for sixty years, and will they ever cease to be infant manufactures until weaned from legislative protection?

* * * * * * *

A vast majority of the labor of this country is employed in agriculture, commerce, navigation, and the non-protected pursuits, and if these are depressed their profits are reduced, the wages of those employed in such pursuits fall, many are thrown out of employment, and thus a general fall of wages ensues, and the protected manufacturer eventually obtains labor at a reduced rate. The effect of a protective tariff, in truth, is not to enhance wages, but to depress them, and render capital invested in manufactures more profitable by enhanced prices of the protected fabrics. Wages throughout the whole country become lower than they were before because the aggregate profits of the capital of the nation engaged in all its industry is diminished. Wages in one branch of industry can not be high when they are low in all others, for wages, like all other commodities, unfortunately will soon find the same level. The aggregate profits of all the labor of the country and not of any particular branch of industry constitute the fund out of which wages are paid, and if that general fund is reduced by diminished profits wages throughout the whole country must eventually fall. If, then, the great mass of labor in this country and of capital is invested in agriculture, commerce, navigation, and such branches of industry as require no protection, and these pursuits are injured by a protective tariff, either by diminishing the market for the surplus raised by those thus employed, reducing the price of what they sell, or compelling them to pay more for what they buy, there must be in time a general fall of wages throughout the country, even though a particular branch of industry may have been rendered more profitable by a protective tariff. This duty, then, instead of a protection is a tax upon the whole industry of the country invested in pursuits requiring no tariff.

* * * * * * *

But if the system of reciprocal taxation is wrong, what argument can be offered in favor of high duties upon fabrics of foreign nations when they receive our exports at a nominal duty in exchange? Formerly protectionists admitted that if Great Britain would freely receive our breadstuffs we should take their fabrics at low duties or free of duty in exchange. Then the corn laws were in full force in Great Britain, and it was supposed would so forever remain. But the system was repealed, and our chief agricultural products are now invited free of duty, or at a nominal duty, on the 1st of February next, into all their ports. Our protectionists now abandon their former position and maintain that it injures our farmers to purchase British fabrics at low prices, even though England will take our breadstuffs at a nominal duty in exchange.

* * * * * * *

Our arguments for low duties, as has heretofore been conceded by our most distinguished protectionists, insured the repeal of the British corn laws. Arguments here in favor of protection present to all nations the supposed benefits of restriction, and would therefore persuade them all to enact high tariffs.

* * * * * * *

The protective system is agrarian and a war upon property. It attempts to organize labor and capital by law, adding to the profits of one pursuit by reducing that of another. It is incompatible with the security of capital or labor; for capital is but the accumulation of the gains of labor, and, therefore, whatever destroys the security or profits of capital results in an equal injury to labor. Besides its injurious effects upon industry, it is an arbitrary and despotic power; and if the people should become accustomed to its exercise, looking for legislative support and protection, it would terminate in a struggle for the division and distribution by Congress every year of property, profits, and capital among the favored classes.

I hope I have read enough to induce Senators to read the whole report; indeed, I think I would do the country a service by making it all part of the RECORD for the edification of the people.

I leave it to the protectionists to answer the arguments of Mr. Walker as best they can without further comment. I think they will find it difficult to persuade the intelligent unprotected, laboring, tax-paying men of this country that his presentation of the facts is not true.

When the Morrill protective tariff of March 3, 1861, was pushed through Congress in its closing hours, after Southern Senators had left, the protectionists obtained by it all the bounties any of them supposed Congress would ever venture to give, at least in time of peace; but a great civil war followed, and the energies and resources of the country were strained to the utmost. In addition to the legitimate sources of revenue on such products as whisky, beer, manufactured tobacco, &c., taxation of a character unknown before was resorted to and increased from time to time. Incomes, sales of manufacturers, railroads, hotels, lawyers, doctors, auctioneers, peddlers, insurance agents, deeds, legacies, successions, were all taxed; in short, every dollar that could be squeezed out of the people by hook or crook was taken by internal taxation for revenue purposes.

The total of this domestic tax—

Mr. ALLISON said in his speech referred to—amounted in the fiscal year 1865-'66 to the enormous sum of $310,000,000, and upon manufactured goods alone to the sum of $128,226,784.

A tax of 2 cents, and afterwards of 3 cents, a pound was imposed on raw cotton, which in about two years and a half amounted to $64,000,000. Of course the cost of home production was vastly increased, and the ability of our manufacturers to compete with foreign producers, who were then at peace with the world, was further impaired by the withdrawal of our ships from the ocean, and the transfer of the operatives from the farms and workshops to the Army and Navy. Increased tariff taxation became necessary for the combined purposes of revenue and protection. The tariff was temporarily increased in 1862; 50 per cent. was temporarily added to all duties in the early part of 1864. The sweeping act of June 30, 1864, embraced all tariff and internal taxation; tariff duties were raised to the highest possible point; perhaps they were obliged to be, when everything in the country was taxed so oppressively. The onerous internal taxes then imposed have, however, all been removed, most of them fifteen years ago, except on liquors and tobacco; and the tax on distilled spirits has been reduced from $2 a gallon in 1864 to 90 cents now, and tobacco from 40 cents a pound to 8 cents. Yet the oppressive war-tariff duties of 1864, in spite of the repeal of the internal-revenue taxes to compensate for which they were avowedly increased above the protective rates imposed in 1861, in spite of the pledges and repeated assurances of its managers, made at the time in order to induce Representatives to support the bill, are still substantially maintained, in many instances they have been largely increased, for no other purpose than to enrich by law, at the expense of all the people, a few combinations of the protected pets of Congress.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] had charge of the bill of 1864 in the House of Representatives. His speech made when he presented it will be found in the Globe of June 2, 1864. He said among many other things:

The Treasury requires a larger supply of means, and such sources of revenue as have not already yielded their maximum contributions must now be sought, so that we may fill the measure of our wants. This has made an increase of internal duties necessary, and that increase to a considerable extent imposes upon us the duty as well as affords us the power of obtaining an increased revenue from duties on imports from abroad. The withdrawal of the large number of men now in the field from industrial pursuits leaves a paucity of numbers at home, thereby advancing wages and the cost of living, so that a bushel of corn, a pound of wool, a yard of cloth, or a ton of iron can not now, even reducing the currency to a specie standard, be produced at the same cost that they were three years ago. With the tariff considerably increased, and even if we had no internal taxes to pay, our people will hardly find it less difficult to compete with foreign productions and manufactures than they did in times of peace without any increase of tariff. And when we impose a tax of 5 per cent. upon our manufactures and increase the tariff to the same extent upon foreign manufactures, we leave them upon the same relative footing they were at the start, and neither has cause of complaint. The rates proposed are high nominally and may be so regarded by foreign nations, but considering the weights carried by our own people, other nations will still be able to continue the race with us upon nearly the same terms as heretofore.

* * * * * * *

In making an estimate of the effect of such a war tariff as is now proposed, it is important that we should bear in mind that as we increase the cost of any article we diminish the number of those who are able to consume it.

Again, he said:

Protection was never defended on any other ground than that in the end the consumer obtained his supplies more cheaply. I know sound policy dictates that for proper encouragement of manufacturers all raw materials should be free, and where nations manufacture for exportation no other policy can be maintained. This accounts for the course of France and England upon this subject. They export largely; we do not.

Who would suppose that the man who uttered these sentiments would impose such taxation upon the country as he did by the conference report of March 3, 1883? Again, he said:

The tariff of 1861 upon cotton goods was based upon the idea, then true, that fine, light goods cost more than coarse and heavy. But now the high price of cotton makes coarse and heavy goods often the dearest. Then a duty of 1 cent was placed upon ordinary cotton sheetings, though none could be imported, and they were worth from 8 to 10 cents per yard. Now they sell at 45 cents per yard, and we place a tax upon them of 5 per cent. ad valorem, or 2 cents and 2 mills per yard, and it must be noted the raw cotton is also taxed 2 cents per pound, which makes nearly 1 cent more per yard. Self-preservation, therefore, demands very much higher rates in the tariff on all cotton goods. Absolute protection would be better than a policy which continued a tariff upon foreign importation, but at so high a point as to relieve manufacturers from all check and all competition. When the profits of any business are suddenly increased, new and inexperienced men rush in, and in a short period create the severest competition which trade and manufactures ever have to encounter.

* * * * * * *

This is intended as a war measure, a temporary measure, and we must as such give it our support.

Again, on the 28th of June, 1866 (see Globe, page 3468), the Senator from Vermont apologized to Congress and the country for the imposition, even during the war, of the enormous duties he seeks now to maintain. He said:

The present bill is not likely to suit everybody, and I regard it as only a temporary measure, fit to be introduced because of the imperious necessities of our present condition.

Again, he says:

Although our present tariff, in ordinary times, would be likely to be denounced as prohibition, * * * the present bill is indispensable to preserve the aggregate of our internal revenue.

I attach great importance to these pledges and assurances given by the Senator from Vermont because they were the authorized utterances of the party in power, made and given in its name by the distinguished manager of these important measures. All of them have been ignored and disregarded, and the oppressive war taxes then imposed are now sought to be perpetuated by the united power of the Republican party. I do not believe that their conduct will be approved by the people at the polls.

As early as 1870 many distinguished Republicans, among them General Garfield, denounced the attempted continuance of the war tariff. None did so more earnestly or vigorously than the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] in the speech to which I have already referred. He said:

I desire to call the attention of the committee to the growth of the present tariff. In 1861, at the close of the Thirty-sixth Congress, the policy of the Government was changed by the passage of what was called the "Morrill tariff;" a tariff prepared in the interest of protection, and distinguished from the tariff of 1846 and of 1857 by the imposition of heavy duties upon articles manufactured in this country and by admitting free of duty many raw materials used in such manufactures. This tariff was modified twice during the year 1861 for the purpose of increasing the revenue, but upon leading articles remained substantially the same until July 14, 1862, when a thorough revision of the tariff of 1861 was made. By this revision the tariff was increased generally to compensate for the internal-revenue tax, and upon a few articles for the purpose of increasing the revenue. Mr. Stevens, in debate, said that the principle adopted was the one that was mentioned when the tax bill was under consideration, namely, the additional duty was fixed, as nearly as possible, at the same rate as taxation, except in a few cases, where necessary to correct errors in the present tariff.

* * * * * * * *

Mr. Shellabarger, then a member from Ohio, rose in his seat, and asked Mr. MORRILL if there was any increase of duty over and above the tariff of 1861, save and except the compensating duty made necessary by internal-revenue taxes. Mr. MORRILL said in reply that there was no increase except for that purpose, or for the purpose of revenue upon articles not produced in this country.

Mr. ALLISON added:

At the close of his speech Mr. MORRILL made this pledge:

"This is intended as a war measure, a temporary measure, and we must give it our support as such."

Again, he speaks of it as "a war measure, imposed by the necessities of the Government, the scarcity of laborers, and the enormous direct taxation."

On the following day Mr. ALLISON, again resuming, said:

This large internal-revenue tax was made the excuse and the cause of the advance of the tariff of July 14, 1862, and June 30, 1864. I quoted the language yesterday of the then chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in 1862, Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, himself a protectionist, and certainly in favor of the protection of the great interest of Pennsylvania, iron. He made a pledge upon this floor in 1862 that those additions of duties upon manufactured articles imported in this country were made necessary because of the internal-revenue taxes. Both he and Mr. MORRILL, subsequently chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, declared that the act of June 30, 1864, was a temporary measure, a war measure, and was not intended as a measure which should remain upon the statute-book as a protective tariff in the time of peace.

Mr. ALLISON yielding the floor for a moment to Mr. COX, that gentleman said:

I desire to say, in addition to what has been said by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], that I was on the committee of conference upon the tariff of 1864. The reason why that conference report was made as it was made, the reason given by Mr. MORRILL and Mr. Fessenden, was that the internal tax had been raised, but that the moment that tax was reduced they would be in favor of reducing the custom duties. That was understood when the report was made upon the tariff of 1864; it was one of the conditions leading the conference committee to report that measure.

Mr. ALLISON said further:

It is admitted by all that the increase of the tariff was commenced and carried on upon the basis of the protective duties of the Morrill tariff of 1861; the increase of direct taxation, added to the pause of domestic manufactures, rendered an increased tariff necessary in order to prevent our country being flooded with cheaper foreign productions. Certainly, then, upon the decrease of internal taxation the tariff may be, and ought to be, decreased in proportion, the danger being no longer in existence which was sought to be averted by these increased duties.

But I may be asked how this reduction shall be made. I think it should be made upon all leading articles, or nearly all; and for that purpose, when I get the opportunity in the House, if no gentleman does it before me, I shall move that the pending bill be recommitted to the Ways and Means Committee with instructions to report a reduction upon existing rates of duty equivalent to 20 per cent. upon the existing rates, or one-fifth reduction. Even this will not be a full equivalent for the removal of all internal taxes upon manufactures. It will not be difficult to make a reduction upon this basis.

The Morrison bill is substantially the proposition made by the Senator from Iowa in 1870. I hope we may secure his aid in its passage; the speech he made then would secure it, and surely it would be far more applicable now than it was then. The surplus revenue is larger, the bonds payable before 1891 will not last three years at the present rate of taxation, the business of the country is seriously disturbed by their rapid payment; exports of many important manufactured products are cut off by the high tax on raw material; nearly 90 per cent. of all we can send abroad consists of heavily taxed and wholly unprotected agricultural products. The machinery of the protected industries is now as perfect as any in the world, and has since 1870 doubled its power to displace human labor in the production of manufactures.

The act of 1883 has proved to be a delusion, if not a fraud, in its pretenses of relief from tariff taxation; that is no longer doubtful. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his report to Congress and the official reports from the Bureau of Statistics, falsify all the predictions and assertions that $75,000,000 or anything like that amount has been taken from the burdens of the tax-payers. I shall be disappointed if the distinguished Senator from Iowa is found in the ranks of the ultra-protectionists now.

Perhaps I may just as well make a digression here and say to the Senator from Iowa that I am glad he had nothing to do with the miserable conference report, if it may be dignified with the name of a conference, which fastened the present law upon the country. He may or may not have seen interviews, to which I propose to allude more particularly before I close my remarks, which the Senators from Vermont and Ohio, Messrs. MORRILL and SHERMAN, saw fit to edify the country with after Congress adjourned last year; in which interviews both he and I were made to figure. Mr. SHERMAN, among other things, said in the Commercial-Gazette of Cincinnati, March 14, 1883:

The truth is, there was a grave fault in constituting the committee on the part of the Senate. The two members of the Finance Committee from New England were put on the conference committee when by custom and precedents Mr. JONES, of Nevada, should have been a member, or, if he declined, Mr. ALLISON. The result was that these two New England Senators controlled the conference, and they were known to be opposed to the duty on wool and in favor of an increase on woolen and cotton goods.

I do not propose to stop now to look into the truth of these very serious charges by one protectionist leader against another. Perhaps the protectionists who dictated the conferees, as they did the Tariff Commission, had too vivid a recollection of the attacks the Senator from Iowa had made on the protective tariff in the speech from which I have just read so freely to trust him on that conference committee. However that may be, I feel warranted in asserting that the bill as it passed the Senate would not have been abandoned as it was, and unjustifiable additional taxation would not have been heaped upon the people, if the Senator from Iowa had been a controlling member of it. I will speak of these interviews at the proper time.

I am now seeking to prove, as I said I would, that the present position of the Republican party in opposing all reduction of the war tariff of 1864, and their unqualified support of taxes for protection when revenue is not needed, is in violation of the principles of the Constitution, antagonistic to all the policy and traditions of the country, and in direct opposition to the solemn pledges of the men who now oppose even the moderate reduction proposed by the "Morrison bill."

Mr. MORRILL, in a speech made in the Senate May 9, 1870, while urging the maintenance of tariff duties, retained some faint recollection of the pledges he had given. He said:

At the same time it is a mistake of the friends of a sound tariff to insist upon the extreme rates imposed during the war if less will raise the necessary revenue.

I hope he will show, if he can, that the necessary revenue can not be raised after the 20 per cent. reduction proposed by the Morrison bill is made. If he can not, I trust he will redeem in part his oft-repeated pledges that war-tariff rates ought not to be exacted from the people in time of peace. He proceeded thus:

Whatever percentage of duties was imposed upon foreign goods to cover internal taxes upon home manufactures should not now be claimed as the lawful prize of protection when such taxes have been repealed. There is no longer an equivalent.

* * * * * * *

Protection has here no legitimate claims, and it may be taken off whenever direct taxes are repealed and less revenue is desired.

The Senator's advice to his friends not to claim the war taxes imposed in 1864 any longer "as lawful prizes of protection" was good; he might have called it "booty" held under laws which were unjust after internal taxes had been established. He has managed to give them fourteen more years of plunder; and now, when we propose to take from them much less than he told his friends they ought in justice to surrender, he and all his allies denounce us as enemies of American labor, of which they claim to be the special champions. We admit that they are the champions of all the combinations of wealth that are enriched by taxation. If they succeed in making the people who pay the taxes which they have imposed to give to their friends believe that they are their special friends and advocates as well, they will prove that excessive war taxes, like a great national debt, are a national blessing, and ought to be maintained. What, I ask, would have become of the wages of the laborers in 1870 and since if the war taxes imposed in 1864 had been repealed then, as Senator MORRILL insisted they ought to be?

It can not be pretended that the protected interests become more helpless as they grow older and as their machinery becomes more and more a substitute for human hands and brains. Infancy has been their plea for many years. Is it dotage now?

Mr. President, the truth is, that protectionists at last believe that they can control the legislation of the Government, and not only hold on to the subsidies they now receive, but many of them clamor for more. Their organizations are perfect, and ramify every part of the country. They elect or defeat Senators and Representatives in many places, as they think best for their interest; they own a powerful and intelligent portion of the public press; they can afford to spend and squander hundreds of millions rather than have their privileges curtailed or their bounties diminished. They have their operatives, many of them very intelligent men, so dependent upon them for the support of their families that they can by threats of reducing their wages, if Congress dares to reduce their subsidies, make the workmen, against their interest and often against their will, protest vigorously by petition and otherwise against all reduction of taxation. Dismissal from position follows a refusal to vote and protest as they are expected and often ordered to do. They move like well-trained veterans in every contest, knowing that the tax-paying masses have no combinations, and can have none, no hired press, and no paid advocates. The protectionists are as trained regulars in a conflict with raw militia. Union is strength; wealth is power, and a common interest is a strong bond of union. The cohesive power of public plunder animates the consolidated bands in their raids upon the public Treasury. With all their pretended zeal for the welfare of their operatives, they look upon them as the feudal barons did upon their retainers; as bearers of burdens, to be cared for because they are useful as dray-horses, born saddled and bridled, while they were born booted and spurred ready to ride them by the grace of God.

I said that they approached their present position cautiously, with their line of retreat open. The speeches of Senators ALLISON and MORRILL prove that, and there are many more just like them on the records. I have selected what they said because they are now the chairmen of the Committees on Appropriations and Finance of this body, and therefore the official leaders of it in all matters relating to taxation and expenditures.

It would extend this speech to an unwarrantable length if I should refer to the debates which preceded the passage of the act of June 6, 1872. All agreed then that the war tariff should be reduced, and reference was made time and again by leading Republican Members and Senators to the solemn pledges that they would be, whenever the internal-war taxes were removed which bore specially on manufactures. In obedience to the general demand the then chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, now Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], on the 16th of April, 1872, laid before the House "a bill to reduce duties on imports," &c. (H. R. 2322). I was then a member of his committee, and feel warranted in saying that the bill then submitted by a Republican committee to a House largely Republican reduced the rate of tariff duties on the average, indeed on nearly all the leading articles of manufacture, lower than the Morrison bill now proposes to reduce them. For example, pig-iron was to be taxed $6 a ton; iron ores, 10 per cent. ad valorem; all manufactures of iron not otherwise provided for, 30 per cent. ad valorem. Now pig-iron is taxed $6.72 per ton, which is nearly double the ad valorem that $6 would have been in 1872; iron ore is 75 cents a ton, or from 35 to 40 per cent. ad valorem. Manufactures of iron, now 45 per cent., with the 20 per cent. or one-fifth proposed by the Morrison bill off, would still leave a tax of 34 per cent.

But I need not go into details. The Dawes bill of 1872 is printed. I hold it in my hand. It gives in parallel columns the rate of duties under the then existing laws, substantially the rates which were imposed during the war and existed March 3, 1883, the rates under the acts of March 3, 1857, July 30, 1846, and August 30, 1842, so that Senators can make the comparison for themselves. That act, as is well known, did not become a law, but a horizontal reduction was made of 10 per cent. on the same plan as now proposed by the Morrison bill by the act of June 6, 1872.

That act, so far as it reduced tariff duties 10 per cent., was repealed February 8, 1875, on the pretense that it was necessary to increase tariff taxation in order sacredly to provide for the (so called) sinking fund by paying some $40,000,000 every year, although we had then paid over $225,000,000 in the aggregate towards the reduction of the principal of the national debt; more than it was ever contended that the laws relative to the sinking fund required.

The restoration of the tariff by the act of 1875 to the highest point the protectionists had ever ventured to ask, even when war was flagrant and internal taxes enormous, was of course a great victory for them. It was won by false pretenses. The plighted faith of the nation, the honor of the country, the integrity of the sinking fund, were the rallying-cries. The Democratic party met the issue at once with most pronounced emphasis, against the protest of the same class of Democrats who now deprecate all efforts to reduce taxation. The most prominent and important plank in the platform at Saint Louis in 1876, upon which we elected Mr. Tilden, reads thus:

> We denounce the present tariff levied upon nearly four thousand articles as a master-piece of injustice, inequality, and false pretenses. It yields a dwindling, not a yearly rising revenue. It has impoverished many industries to subsidize a few. It prohibits imports that might purchase the products of American labor. It has degraded American commerce from the first to an inferior rank on the high seas. It has cut down the sales of American manufactures at home and abroad, and depleted the returns of American agriculture, an industry followed by half our people. It costs the people five times more than it produces to the Treasury, obstructs the processes of production, and wastes the fruits of labor. It promotes fraud, fosters smuggling, enriches dishonest officials, and bankrupts honest merchants. We demand that all custom-house taxation shall be only for revenue.

If Mr. Tilden had been allowed to take his seat the tariff would have been promptly reformed on a revenue basis. His failure to do so was not the fault of Democratic voters; that is all I care to say on that subject. The House of Representatives, however, was Democratic, and the country expected it to redeem the pledges the party had made. Subsequent events proved that its organization or something else was deficient. The Chief Magistrate, whose zeal and wisdom would have guided the counsels of the Representatives and strengthened their hands for the work of revenue reform, having been defrauded out of his position, his followers were without a leader, or at least without one leading in the direction he would have led them; therefore they stumbled, blundered, divided, and failed.

The protectionists then thought that the Democratic organization was stronger, wiser, and truer to its principles than it proved to be, and like prudent men they prepared to make the best terms they could when the tariff reform so urgently demanded and so solemnly promised was brought before Congress. These organizations met and consulted all over the country. They knew large reductions of their bounties ought to be made; they believed they would be. After agreeing among themselves, they selected one of the ablest Republicans in the House, its former Speaker, then a leading member of the Ways and Means Committee, Hon. N. P. Banks, of Massachusetts, to represent them. He did so faithfully on the 7th of May, 1868, saying among other things:

> These papers which I hold in my hand bear the official signatures of the authorized representatives of one hundred and twelve manufacturing corporations and firms of New England, in which they themselves suggest and consent to reduction of duties upon an extended and complete list of articles of foreign manufacture which come actively and directly in competition with the industries in which they are engaged, rising from 10 to 20, 30, 40, and 50 per cent. upon the present schedule of duties upon such importations. More than a hundred and twelve corporations and firms of cotton and woolen manufacturers alone, of their own choice and after repeated conferences, in which all the interests of the textile fabrics of this country were considered, high and low, made this proposition. * * * As it was with the cotton manufacturers, so it was with the woolen manufacturers. They consented to and in a certain sense recommended, as of their own accord, a reduction of duties of from 23 to 25 per cent.
> Mr. HOOKER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him why these interests asked a diminution of the tariff?
> Mr. BANKS. Because their attention had been called to the subject. It was their duty to make known to the Government what they desired. They found when they brought their representative men together from all parts of the country that the duties could be reduced and they could still pursue their vocations with more or less success, and like honest and honorable citizens they made that declaration to the Government. And so did the wool-growers from California to New England. They assembled in the State of New York for the same purpose, and after long and anxious conference one with another and with the woolen manufacturers they agreed, as did the silk manufacturers, to what extent they would recommend a reduction of the duty.

He laid before Congress a liberal schedule of reductions, which, if it had been adopted, would have given great relief to the country. The failure of that Congress to reduce taxation consolidated all the protected interests and enabled them, with an army of well-paid officials, many of them afraid to turn over their books, by the aid of enforced political assessments, liberal contributions among themselves, and from those who sought high positions, to run the Dorsey-Brady campaign of 1880 successfully. Still they were not happy. The present Chief Magistrate, in his first message to Congress of December 6, 1881, said:

> In view, however, of the heavy load of taxation which our people have already borne we may well consider whether it is not the part of wisdom to reduce the revenues, even if we delay a little the payment of the debt. It seems to me that the time has arrived when the people may justly demand some relief from their present onerous burden, and that by due economy in the various branches of the public service this may be readily afforded.

These suggestions evidently alarmed the leaders of the protectionists. They had succeeded in the former Congress in passing a bill for a tariff commission through the Senate, aided, I admit, by Democratic votes, placing the whole subject in the hands of the President, which I knew, and thought everybody ought to know, which the protected combinations and their advisers here thoroughly understood, that a Democratic House of Representatives would never agree to. Of course it did not, and they gained at least a year more of subsidy by preventing action during that Congress.

In December, 1881, both branches of Congress became Republican. The Senator from Vermont was ready to secure at least another year of bounty for the favored classes whose special champion he had become, notwithstanding his solemn and oft-repeated pledges that the people should have relief from their exactions. As soon as Congress met he reintroduced the Tariff-Commission bill, referred it to the Committee of Finance, of which he was chairman, supported it with a long, carefully prepared speech, and of course carried it. A Republican House of Representatives surrendered, as he knew it would, its constitutional prerogatives over tax or revenue bills to the commission, although it had both a long and a short session ahead of it, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of that body [Mr. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania] being in full accord with the Senator from Vermont. Another year of good picking from the popular goose, who seemed to enjoy the process, was secured to their pets. The House, however, before the close of the long session sent to the Senate a bill reducing internal-revenue taxes, carefully excluding from it everything relating to the tariff, which, being a revenue measure, subject to amendment, enabled us to add modifications of tariff taxation to it. I do not care to say much about the Tariff Commission. I had occasion to express my opinion of it and its work pretty freely last year while considering the propositions it submitted for our consideration. The letter of Mr. Kenner to Mr. Ames and to his glucose friend, and the letter from Mr. Porter to Judge KELLEY, read on this floor, and other equally damaging facts shown as to the conduct of others, proved that the commission was utterly unworthy of public confidence. Indeed, the public interest was ignored by it. It paraded two vast volumes of so-called testimony, which it wholly disregarded. It turned over each of the schedules to the parties interested in maintaining the highest possible rates of duties, and allowed them, by cunning changes of classification and changes from ad valorem to specific rates and to specifics based upon ad valorems, to increase the burdens of taxation, while pretending to make reductions. In fact it either artfully concealed or was ignorant of the effect of its own work, as the very plausible report accompanying its bill showed. Its professions and its practices were so variant, that one of the leading merchants of Boston after a careful study of it concluded that the proper course for Congress to pursue was to adopt the report and defeat the bill. The most charitable construction to place on the repeated statements of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] is, that they even deceived him. He opened the debate on the bill January 10, 1883, by assuring Congress that the proposed tariff reduction would amount to $45,000,000. Again, on the 6th of February, he said:

> I desire to appeal to the Senate to know, even from those who may differ radically from me as to the theory of a tariff bill, whether the bill that is now under consideration does not propose as large and as radical a reduction of the rates of duties as would be proper under any circumstances to suddenly adopt, and as large as are likely to be obtained for some years to come?

Even after the bill had passed and Congress had adjourned, as late as April 28, in his carefully prepared interview in reply to that of Senator SHERMAN, the Senator from Vermont, still lauding his work of reduction, said:

> Too much money flowing into the Treasury was an evil scarcely less than would have been too little. It depleted every man's pocket, while at the same time it engendered a too lavish expenditure. The surrender of laws heretofore yielding seventy-five millions of revenue was beyond dispute a great measure, and of course excites astonishment abroad that it was attempted with so little official flourish. It was the work of Congress, and not "cut and dried" by a Cabinet premier.

Senator SHERMAN, in his interview from which I have already quoted, agrees with him in regard to the great reduction that had been made. He says:

> It is a rare thing in the history of any nation to be able to repeal taxes yielding $75,000,000 a year.

In the face of such assertions by both the leaders of the protectionists it will not only "excite astonishment abroad" but at home when it is made apparent that outside of the reductions made on sugar, raw wool, and silk goods there is no reduction, at least in the burden of tariff taxation, taking all the schedules together. On the contrary, there is a positive increase of taxation on many important classes of goods used by all the people, so that whatever of reduction of revenue may follow will come from prohibition of imports and consequent increase of price to consumers of the home product, and of course an abandonment of all efforts to build up an export trade. I propose to prove that by the official statements of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Bureau of Statistics.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his last report, speaking of the Tariff Commission, quotes the following from their report:

> Early in its deliberations the commission became convinced that a substantial reduction of tariff duties is demanded, not by mere indiscriminate popular clamor but by the best conservative opinion of the country, including that which has in former times been most strenuous for the preservation of our national industrial defenses. Such a reduction of the existing tariff the commission regards as not only a due recognition of public sentiment and a measure of justice to consumers but one conducive to the general industrial prosperity, and which, though it may be temporarily inconvenient, will be ultimately beneficial to the special interests affected by such reduction.

Again—

> Entertaining these views, the commission has sought to prevent a scheme of tariff duties in which substantial reduction should be the distinguishing feature. The average reduction in rates, including that from the enlargement of the free-list and the abolition of the duties on charges and commissions, at which the commission has aimed, is not less on the average than 20 per cent., and it is the opinion of the commission that the reduction will reach 25 per cent.

The Secretary, speaking from the official records, proceeds to say:

> The chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance, in explanation of the bill before the Senate last year, which after various amendments became a law, estimated at $45,000,000 the reduction of the revenue which would follow the changes in the tariff proposed thereby. These intentions and calculations have not been verified.

The Secretary adds:

> There was general agreement that a substantial reduction of the tariff should be made. The estimates of the Tariff Commission and of the Senate committee show what was the contemplated reduction. The actual results so far obtained indicate that the reduction labored for has not been effected by the new tariff act. It is to be considered, too, that the failure is not to be charged to the increase of importations keeping up the amount of customs revenue. The statistics of our foreign commerce show that there has not been an increase chargeable thereto.
> In the report of this Department last year the reduction as applied to the principal classes of dutiable articles was considered somewhat in detail, and, adhering to the views there expressed, a repetition of them is unnecessary.

In the former report to which the Secretary refers he says:

> In reading the testimony before the Tariff Commission it is to be observed that with scarcely an exception the representative of every industry, while conceding that a general reduction of the tariff is proper and necessary, has claimed that its peculiar product can submit to no reduction of the protection now afforded.
> While the views of the manufacturers are to be weighed, it is manifest that they will never be able to agree upon a reduction of the tariff duties.

He was not aware that they had been allowed by the Tariff Commission to make up the respective schedules in their own interest and had done so in such a cunning way as to increase their own bounties while pretending to give relief. Again, he says:

> The classes of merchandise paying the largest amount of duties from customs are the following, in the order named: Sugar and molasses, wool and manufactures from it, iron and steel and the manufactures from them, manufactures of silk, manufactures of cotton, amounting to about one hundred and thirty-seven and a half millions. A substantial reduction upon each of the class of articles named is recommended. And it is believed that the time has arrived when a reduction of duties on nearly all the articles in our tariff is demanded and is feasible.
> The cotton tariff is found complex and inconsistent, and it is no doubt true that in most of the coarser classes of cotton fabrics our manufacturers can compete with the world without protection.

The President, in his message in December, 1882, had been equally emphatic in his demands for the reduction of tariff taxation. He fully indorses the Secretary of the Treasury, saying:

> I heartily approve the Secretary's recommendation of immediate and extensive reductions in the annual revenues of the Government. It will be remembered that I urged upon the attention of Congress at its last session the importance of relieving the industry and enterprise of the country from the pressure of unnecessary taxation. It is one of the tritest maxims of political economy that all taxes are burdensome, however wisely and prudently imposed. And though there have always been among our people wide differences of sentiment as to the best methods of raising the national revenues, and indeed as to the principles upon which taxation should be based, there has been substantial accord in the doctrine that only such taxes ought to be levied as are necessary for a wise and economical administration of the Government. Of late the public revenues have far exceeded that limit, and unless checked by appropriate legislation such excesses will continue to increase from year to year. For the fiscal year ended June 30, 1881, the surplus revenue amounted to $100,000,000; for the fiscal year ended 30th of June last the surplus was more than $145,000,000. The report of the Secretary shows what disposition has been made of these moneys. They have not only answered the requirements of the sinking fund, but have afforded a large balance applicable to other reductions of the public debt.
> But I renew the expression of my conviction that such rapid extinguishment of the national indebtedness as is now taking place is by no means a cause for congratulation; it is a cause rather for serious apprehension. If it continues, it must be speedily followed by one of the evil results so clearly set forth in the report of the Secretary.
> Either the surplus must lie idle in the Treasury or the Government will be forced to buy at market rates its bonds not then redeemable, and which, under such circumstances, can not fail to command an enormous premium, or the swollen revenues will be devoted to extravagant expenditure, which, as experience has taught, is ever the bane of an overflowing Treasury.
> It was made apparent, in the course of the animated discussions which this question aroused at the last session of Congress, that the policy of diminishing the revenue by reducing taxation commanded the general approval of the members of both Houses. I regret that because of conflicting views, as to the best methods by which that policy should be made operative, none of its benefits have as yet been reaped.

No man can make a better Democratic speech to-day than the President then did. He asserts that all taxes are burdensome, however prudently imposed; that all taxation should be levied only for revenue sufficient to support a wise and economical administration of the Government; that the large surplus now produced was cause for serious apprehension, as it would be devoted to extravagant expenditure, which is ever the bane of an overflowing treasury. These are the issues we are now pressing; they are more urgent now than when the President presented them.

I thought it best to refer to the message of the President and the report of the Secretary, which were sent to the last Congress at the opening of its last session in order to emphasize the demand for a substantial bona fide reduction of tariff taxation and not of increased burdens by prohibitory legislation which should amount to at least 20 or 25 per cent., in order to make the failure to grant any substantial relief by the act of March 3, 1883, more prominent. The statement of the Secretary in his last report that the failure to give relief can not "be charged to the increase of importations keeping up the amount of the customs revenue, as the statistics show that there has not been an increase of imports," is the most damaging of all the facts shown, as the protectionists have always alarmed the country, and especially their workmen, with the cry that on a reduction of duties the products of foreign pauper labor would flood the country, force them to close their shops, and let their laborers starve, unless they worked at greatly reduced wages. Imports have diminished instead of increasing since the act of March 3, 1883, took effect; but wages have not increased, nor have the workmen been more constantly employed. Protectionists can not delude any man who has capacity to read or to think with that humbug or bugbear any longer.

Now, as to the proof of the truth of the statement of the Secretary and of the false pretenses of the protectionist leaders, in and out of Congress, as furnished by the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department, our highest official authority. The following official table shows it all:

Values of imports of dutiable merchandise entered for consumption in the United States, with the amount of duty and the ad valorem rate of duty collected during the following periods, during the six months ended December 31.

JOSEPH NIMMO, JR., Chief of Bureau.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS, March 10, 1884.

That table tells the whole story. Instead of a reduction of 30 per cent., or $3,681,000, as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] avowed was the reduction he proposed and thought the bill he advocated would give on cotton goods, the act of 1883 has increased the burdens of taxation on that class of goods on the average of imports from $37.61, on each one hundred dollars' worth imported, to $40.07, being an additional burden of $2.46 on each $100 on the value of the consumption of cotton goods imported last year, which amounted to $37,970,610, of over $825,000, leaving out the consequent corresponding increase of price on all cotton goods manufactured at home. That increase was so cunningly adjusted by the Eastern manufacturers, who fixed up the schedule, and by the so-called conference committee, that large reductions were made on all the coarser classes of cotton manufactures, which need no protection, and in the production of which the people of the South are rapidly surpassing their New England competitors notwithstanding their poverty, their disorganized and unskilled labor, their want of machinery and workshops, in fair competition under absolute free trade between them and New England, with her skilled, organized labor and wonderful machinery, obtained by a quarter of a century of high protection when she had no home competition. If infant industries ever needed protection against those that are well organized, and which had been built up by long-continued subsidies, paid by home consumers of their goods, the Southern cotton manufacturers needed it against New England. Yet they have won under free trade. New England makes pretense of liberality now by reducing tariff taxation on these goods which the South has taken from her; but she has added it, and more than all of it, by $2.46 on each one hundred dollars' worth (as the official table shows), to the goods she still retains control of.

If this Congress will give the South the right to buy her cotton machinery free from tariff taxation it will confer a blessing upon her which will enable her to educate her children, white and black, by the general prosperity it will bring, and this school fund will be permanent. That done, there would be substantial evidence of good-will. Instead of that, the increase of burdens was the work of the New England manufacturers. Neither Congress nor the Tariff Commission had anything to do with it. The cotton schedule was fixed up so cunningly that Mr. SHERMAN had to say:

The classification is so changed that none but an expert can understand it.

In regard to this matter Mr. ALLISON said in this Chamber, on the 3d day of February, 1883 (see RECORD of that date, page 2030):

Now I want to say one word with regard to the Tariff Commission report upon the cotton schedule. The truth is that the Tariff Commission did not examine this cotton matter at all, it may as well be said on the floor of the Senate; nor did they make this schedule that is called the Tariff Commission report schedule. It was made by a cotton manufacturer from Boston with an expert appraiser in New York, and the Tariff Commission accepted it. When the knowledge of that fact came to me I had no particular faith in the Tariff Commission report on this cotton schedule, and therefore I examined it as best I could for myself, hearing the witnesses, reading the testimony, and hearing people who I supposed knew something about it and in whom I had faith.

When the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] asked him what faith there was to be placed in their report on anything else after such conduct as that was developed, Mr. ALLISON answered:

I do not choose to express my opinion of their report on anything else.

Mr. BUTLER. With permission of the Senator from Kentucky, I will read the following extracts from the Charleston News and Courier of April 1, as bearing on the point he is now discussing:

COTTON AND THE TARIFF—REPRESENTATIVE COTTON MANUFACTURERS IN FAVOR OF ABOLISHING THE ENTIRE SYSTEM.

Mr. H. H. Hickman, president of the company owning the cotton-mills at Vaucluse and Graniteville, S. C., in reply to the question as to how much he would be injured by the modification of the tariff on cotton goods, said: "Not at all. On the contrary, we would be in favor of an absolute abolition of the entire tariff system, were that possible."

Mr. C. H. Phinizy, president of the Augusta Cotton Mills, the largest establishment of the kind in the South, says: "The cotton factories as well as the cotton producers of the South would be greatly benefited by the total abolition of all tariff duties."

Mr. Charles Estes, president of the John P. King Mill Company, says: "The abolition of all duties on cotton goods would not injure us at all. The tariff is a positive clog upon the development of our cotton-manufacturing industries."

Mr. George C. Richardson, the agent in Boston for Lowell, Lawrence, Lewiston, and other cotton-mills, admits that the profits of most of the mills are very large, and declares that "the cotton industry could now thrive under free trade." Mr. Richardson recommends that the duties be stricken from raw materials as a whole.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment? If he prefers, I shall let him finish and then ask him a question.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir. The article proceeds:

Mr. W. H. Young, president of the Eagle and Phœnix Manufacturing Company, at Columbus, Ga., declares that if the tariff were removed on all articles that enter into the manufacture of cotton goods this country could command the markets of the world, and the supremacy of England in this trade would be ended. He believes that if the tariff were entirely abolished this country would find in England a large market for manufactures of cotton and wool.

During the last four years the Canadians have congratulated themselves on the extension of their cotton manufactures under the stimulus of the protective tariff. Yet it has been shown by the New York Bulletin that while in 1879 under a revenue tariff 2,265 operatives earned an average of $250 a year each, in 1882, under a protective tariff, the 10,200 hands employed earned an average of $109 each.

Mr. W. F. Herring, a native of Georgia, who has all his life been identified with Southern cotton-manufacturing interests, and conducted an agency in New York for the sale of Southern cotton goods for many years, in a recent letter to a friend in Georgia who had written to him for advice in regard to the purchase of some property on the Oconee River, near Athens, Ga., said: "If I felt sure of free trade in this country within three years, I would not hesitate to buy the property referred to. With free trade, I think it would quickly quadruple in value, because there would be little risk in utilizing it for cotton-mills. But I would not invest in new cotton-mills or in shoals upon which to build them now, because the development in that line has nearly if not quite reached the limit to which it is restricted by our tariff. In other words, I think we are making as many goods as this country needs. Our protective system interposes so many obstacles and hinderances to our reaching foreign markets with our goods that our natural advantages over other countries are well-nigh nullified. * * * If we had free trade with the world I would rate the stock which I own in cotton-mills at least 50 per cent. higher than I rate it now."

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator cut that out and hand it to me so that I may make it a part of my remarks?

Mr. BUTLER. These are the opinions of gentlemen almost all of whom I know, and gentlemen of the highest intelligence and character in the South.

Mr. ALDRICH. I wanted——

Mr. BECK. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. BECK. The Senator will allow me to proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILSON in the chair). The Senator from Kentucky has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BECK. I wish to try to get my remarks into shape.

Mr. ALDRICH. I want to call attention to the fact that some of the opinions there quoted from some gentlemen of the North are not their opinions, but the statement of some newspaper gentlemen.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not prepared to vouch for anybody, except that I know the gentlemen from my immediate neighborhood, and I know it expresses their opinion.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not doubt that.

Mr. BECK. I am glad that the Republican party make the justice of that part of their tariff an issue before the people. Not content with that, in order to still further cripple Southern opposition to their monopoly they had so long enjoyed, they by the act of 1883 largely increased the tariff duties on cotton card clothing and other cotton machinery, New England being amply supplied and being largely engaged in its manufacture, while the Southern States need everything of that sort. I have exact information furnished by one of the largest builders and importers of cotton machinery in the East, who furnishes the Southern people with it, perhaps more extensively than any other establishment. I do not propose to give names; that seems to be seized upon by the other side at once as a convenient form of diverting attention from the main question, or of causing men to be persecuted at home for daring to tell anything against their interest. They have every protected organization at their backs, with every fact or assumption favorable to them put in the most plausible form. Yet the experience of last winter showed that every gentleman who dared to say anything against the subsidized classes was denounced and persecuted.

I will not hereafter expose gentlemen, who give me facts for public use, to such treatment. I mention this once for all. After stating fully the various prices of card clothing, my correspondent says:

You therefore see that the new tariff is an advance on all costing below 70 cents per foot in England and a reduction on all costing over 70 cents; but probably 95 per cent. of all card clothing imported costs less than 70 cents, there being little demand for dearer grades.

I have given you prices from 39 cents to 58 cents per square foot, which, as said before, covers nearly all of our importations:

| | Cts. | Cts. | Cts. | Cts. | Cts. | Cts. | Cts. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Cash price in England | 39.00 | 42.00 | 45.00 | 49.00 | 52.00 | 55.00 | 58.00 |
| Three per cent., packing and delivery free on board steamship | 1.17 | 1.26 | 1.35 | 1.47 | 1.56 | 1.65 | 1.74 |
| Total cost, free on board | 40.17 | 43.26 | 46.35 | 50.47 | 53.56 | 56.65 | 59.74 |
| Duty, 35 per cent. on free-on-board cost | 14.05 | 15.14 | 16.22 | 17.66 | 18.75 | 19.83 | 20.91 |
| Total cost, including packing and delivery, free on board, and duty, 35 per cent., added | 54.22 | 58.40 | 62.57 | 68.13 | 72.31 | 76.48 | 80.65 |
| Total cost, free on board, as before given | 40.17 | 43.26 | 46.35 | 50.47 | 53.56 | 56.65 | 59.74 |
| Present duty, 25 cents per square foot | 25.00 | 25.00 | 25.00 | 25.00 | 25.00 | 25.00 | 25.00 |
| | 65.17 | 68.26 | 71.35 | 75.47 | 78.56 | 81.65 | 84.74 |
| Twenty-five cents per square foot is equal to (per cent.) duty of | .64 | 59.5 | 55.5 | .51 | .48 | 45.4 | 43.00 |

The last figures indicate the present rate per cent. as compared with the 35 per cent. imposed prior to March, 1883, it being now 64 per cent. on goods costing 40 cents, and 43 per cent. on goods costing 60 cents, instead of 35 per cent. on all classes.

My correspondent takes up the present and former rates of taxation on cotton machinery, and after giving in detail all the costs, charges, and other expenses under the former rate of 35 per cent. ad valorem and the present rate of 45, making all proper allowances and additions for the parts composed of steel and iron, he adds:

Where we paid formerly $41.14 we pay now $45, or about 10 per cent. advance on the old duty.

These are some of the classes of goods which the protectionists insist shall not be interfered with, and denounce the Morrison bill and all its supporters as disturbers of the peace and prosperity of the country for daring to ask any modification of these extortions. For one I accept the issue and am willing to appeal to the people at the polls.

Returning to Mr. Nimmo's official table, in regard to wool and woolens, Senator MORRILL, when he laid his bill before the Senate, said that the proposed reduction on that class of goods would amount, in his opinion, to $4,845,000. The official tables show that while clothing-wool was reduced from 56.46 per cent. to 44.73, combing-wool from 50.19 to 43.48, and carpet-wool from 27.79 to 25.02, the taxes on manufactures of wool were increased from an average of 66.71 to 68.90, or taxed above what they were under the old law $2.19 on each one hundred dollars' worth. The imports of woolen goods last year amounted to $51,100,000, the increased tax on which, at $2.19 per $100, amounts to considerably over a million of dollars annually, and the increase is very much greater than that on the classes of goods in which the large manufacturers are specially interested. That is another of the benefits the protectionists have conferred upon the country, which the farmers and laboring classes are called upon to rise up and defend against the assaults of the Democratic party. It will be observed that duties were not increased on fabrics which the small woolen factories throughout the country could manufacture. They were reduced on many of them. They were raised only on the classes of goods for the making of which the largest and richest concerns in the East have the requisite machinery. Indeed, the plea for increased taxation was made on behalf of infant machinery, and not for human labor. They did not get quite all they wanted. Senators may recollect that for two or three days last winter we resisted, as best we could with the information attainable at the time, the proposed increase, and with the aid of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] defeated it; but the committee obtained leave to reconsider it, and finally passed it, in a modified form. Senator SHERMAN said, during the debate:

That about one-half of the cost of these woolen goods is in the cost of the raw material, the wool, and the other half is the cost of manufacture. Take, therefore, a lot of these goods; suppose that the value of the goods imported is $1,000, and one-half of that is the cost of the wool, and the other half is the cost of manufacture. The duty on $500, the cost of the wool, has already been fully compensated for and more than compensated for by the specific duty. Then, as to the duty as levied, not as 40 per cent. of the $500 the cost of manufacture, which is all the manufacturer puts upon it, but the duty is levied at 40 per cent. on the thousand, thus giving him a protection of $400, or 80 per cent. on the cost of manufacture. It seems to me that is too large, that the relative duties upon wool and woolen goods are unequal and unfair. The duty ought to be in proportion to the manufactures.

The tax is a compound one, 9 cents a square yard and 40 per cent. ad valorem. I knew then that the consumers of these goods, and that means everybody, were being cheated, but did not know to what extent, as I was not an expert nor a dealer in goods. I therefore placed myself in communication last fall with the best informed men I could reach who were engaged in that business, and I now have information both accurate and reliable which will destroy all the false pretenses of the protectionists if the subject reaches the Senate. A few lines from a letter written by a leading merchant in New York explains the effect of the law which was imposed upon the country by such crooked methods. The writer says to me:

Last March we had our wool goods advanced from 20½ to 25 per cent. Manufacturers got their wool reduced, and chemicals and dye-stuffs were either put on the free-list or materially reduced. All low goods, as I have advised you, have been made prohibitory by the act of March 3, 1883.

I have been furnished with a number of valuable tables, several of them actual invoices, showing that on worsted dress goods of cheap grades the duty had been increased from 74 to 99 per cent., or 25 per cent. above the war-tariff rates; and on very large classes of French goods which the plainest people use the increase has been from 20 to 25 per cent., running them up to 80, 90, and 100 per cent. These tables are too voluminous to insert in the RECORD, but they are on my desk subject to the inspection of Senators. I have other valuable and instructive tables, showing that even the apparently large reductions in other classes of mixed woolen and cotton goods are false pretenses, since they give no real relief. I believe I will read one of the tables showing the so-called reductions made and the statement which accompanies it, so as to make this fact plain.

Table showing the rate of duty on worsted and worsted and cotton dress goods weighing six ounces to the square yard, under the tariff in force prior to July 1, 1883, and the tariff of July 1, 1883.

The duty upon these goods previous to the war was simply 19 per cent. ad valorem.

My correspondent adds:

Since the late war the people have been robbed of many millions of dollars through the operations of the foregoing clause and those of a similar nature covering this class of goods. The rate of duty has been steadily and rapidly advanced until it is now absolutely prohibitory upon a great many goods that are made in Europe for the use of the poor people and that are now shut out by reason of excessive duty. Under the pretense of reducing taxation the manufacturers decrease the duty upon goods that are imported in small quantities or not at all, and shrewdly raise the rates upon goods that have taken the place of those which are reduced.

The above table is a proper illustration of this management. All importers who buy goods abroad are always very particular in making purchases to buy no low goods, at the prices noted on this table, that weigh over four ounces to the square yard. If by accident a case comes out occasionally that does weigh more, and the importer is fortunate enough to discover it before duty is paid, the case is shipped back or sold in bond to Canada. If duty has been paid, he can not rebond them, but is obliged to sell them for what he can get and the sale invariably results in a heavy loss. The reduction on July 1 last, from the previous tariff looks well on paper. Goods that cost 262 per cent. duty to land now only cost 199 per cent., but the reduction grows smaller as the goods advance in value; so, when we take those that cost 30 cents a square yard, the duty is now but 84 per cent. ad valorem, whereas it was 98 per cent. under the former tariff. All these rates, under the tariff of March 3, 1883, are absolutely prohibitory. When we take fine French goods of high cost, they are imported, but these low goods can not be. Thus the poor people and middle classes are entirely shut out from procuring any thick, warm, comfortable goods for winter wear of foreign make. The American manufacturers have all this business to themselves. They knew well, when they had this law made, that the present rate is equally prohibitory with the old rate, and that they could well afford to make the show of reduction which they do, as it in no way would interfere with them. As a just punishment to these manufacturers, the rates should be put back to where they were before the war, to 19 per cent. ad valorem, and so do away with these compound duties.

To test somewhat the accuracy of these tables and statements, I turned to the last official summary of exports and imports furnished by Mr. Nimmo, dated March 8, 1884, and find that the imports of wool for the first seven months of the fiscal year 1883 was 42,471,779 pounds, and for the first seven months of 1884, 49,532,153, or an excess of imports of wool this year of 6,090,374. Turning to women and children's dress goods, the imports for the same time show that in 1883 45,826,786 square yards were imported, and in 1884 35,931,393 square yards, a falling off of 9,995,393 square yards in seven months of the current fiscal year. The official records therefore verify what my correspondents say, that the manufacturers have adjusted the tariff so as to cheapen the wool they use 10 per cent. and increase the cost of the goods they produce 25 per cent., making the lower or cheaper goods prohibitory, and thus give them a monopoly of the home market at their own prices; this, too, is done in the interest of the people—the laboring people.

Returning once more to the official tables, by the act of March 3, 1883, the cheapest earthen, stone, and crockery ware, which the very poorest of the laboring classes are compelled to buy, and of which more is destroyed than any other article of household goods, is now taxed 60 per cent., or $60 is added to the price of every one hundred dollars' worth. Under the war tariff, the temporary high protective system, which could only be justified because of the oppressive internal-revenue taxes, and the strain on all the resources of the country, and from the oppressions of which relief was so often promised, the tariff tax was 40 per cent. Fifty per cent. was added mainly by the conference committee, in the interest, I presume, of the laboring man, on this indispensable class of goods; and at the same time that taxes amounting to 80 and 100 per cent. (25 per cent. higher than the taxes of the war tariff) are now imposed upon the clothes that the family of the laborer must wear, and 60 per cent. upon his crockery, the patriotic protectionists strike down the taxes on the richest and most costly silks and satins from 60 to 50 per cent., in the interest, doubtless, of the much loved and highly favored American laborer. Such pretenses are the baldest hypocrisy.

As I said a while ago, the whole system of tariff taxation is so adjusted as to bear with crushing weight on the laboring poor; the purchasing power of their wages is diminished by it at least 40 per cent.; the coachman of the richest nabob in New York, if he has a family, pays more to support the Federal Government than the millionaire who hires him if his employer has no children to clothe. And more unjust than all, the cheap blankets, worsteds, cottons, crockery, and everything of low grade pays nearly double the tax that the same things do when they are costly. The English laborer may be a pauper; it would be unpatriotic, I presume, to say that he is not; but his government does not collect its revenues from his labor nor from the wants and necessities of his family. Excepting a low tax on tea and coffee, both of which are cheaper there than here, the English laboring man who does not drink spirits or use tobacco is not taxed one penny to support the Government of Great Britain. His wages have their full purchasing power for his own use and benefit. He can clothe himself, his wife, and family, furnish his house, and procure all he needs in the cheapest open markets of the world. He can buy everything except provisions for less than half of what the American laborer has to pay for like articles. He gets nine and a half pounds of sugar for the same money that the American gets six for. In short, the tax-laws of England require the wealth and property of the kingdom and the luxuries they demand to support the government. We exempt wealth and property from Federal taxation and require the wants and necessities of labor to support the Federal Government and to furnish subsidies far beyond all that the Government takes to enrich a favored class by law, who refuse to work unless they are subsidized from the wages of labor. The people are learning that these things are true. I repeat that the position now taken by the Republican leaders, namely, that no relief from the present system of taxation will be tolerated, ought to hurl them from place and power, and it will if the Democratic party is true to its principles, to itself, and to the interests of the unprotected masses of the people whose only protector it is against the avarice and rapacity of the combinations of subsidized corporations which have been built up by Congressional class legislation.

But, independent of its injustice and extortions, I insist that the act of March 3, 1883, ought to be and will be condemned and repudiated by the American people, because of the manner and the methods of its imposition upon the country. It is in no proper sense an act passed by the American Congress; it was never even allowed to be read in the presence of the Representatives of the people (who have the only constitutional power to originate bills imposing taxes upon the country), far less considered by them, as the records of the last Congress show conclusively. It was called up in the House and read by its title January 25, 1883 (RECORD, page 1585). No part of the body of the bill was read. It was proceeded with by schedules and paragraphs, and discussed till the 17th of February, the sugar schedule having been then reached; and none of the schedules relating to tobacco, provisions, liquors, cotton and cotton goods, hemp, jute, &c., wool and woolens, silk goods, sundries, or the free list, were read when the bill was abandoned; and on 19th of February Hon. W. D. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, who had charge of it, announced that the Senate was maturing a bill, and that it was—

Yet possible that the two Houses may be brought to an agreement on a tariff bill.

He was looking, of course, to a committee of conference as the last and safest resort; therefore the protectionists determined to abandon the bill presented by them to the House. When the bill passed by the Senate was sent to the House the RECORD shows that it was not even then allowed to be read; members were denied the privilege of voting for it; the rules were changed—revolutionized is a better word—so that a majority could take it up and declare a disagreement with the Senate and ask for a committee of conference, and could do nothing else. Even a majority, however pronounced in favor of the Senate bill, were prohibited from voting for it. Mr. BLACKBURN, of Kentucky, a member of the Committee on Rules (see RECORD, page 3370), charged on the floor what the "Keifer-Boynton" investigation has since verified, if any proof was needed, when no man denied what he alleged.

Unwilling—

He said—

to trust to a count which, if common rumor is to be credited, has been carefully made; a count made upon a written agreement signed by members on the other side, binding and obligating themselves to stand for this report and to stand for the motion of non-concurrence; though with care and particularity, as rumor has it (and I doubt not correctly), you have taken time since the Kasson resolution was sent to the Committee on Rules, two weeks ago, to marshal your forces, to obligate them in every manner that is binding, unless it be in an open bond, with good and approved securities for the performance of the contract; in the face of all this, the majority side of the House dare not allow a motion, which is admitted under every parliamentary law, or parliamentary rule, or parliamentary practice ever known among civilized men. You dare not allow a vote to be taken to concur in the Senate amendments to the text of the bill.

Mr. COX, of New York, said:

It is a fraud upon parliamentary law; a fraud upon all that is just and fair in our politics; it is revolutionary.

Mr. House, of Tennessee, said:

It is an open, unblushing attempt to concoct in the secret chamber of a packed conference committee a tariff bill which the promoters of this movement know can not be passed upon the floor of this House under the rules which govern it. It is an attempt by an indefensible, arbitrary, revolutionary act to wrest from the representatives of the people the right of legislation; to tie their hands, and to deny them the poor privilege of lifting their voices against it.

Not content with procuring a committee of high protectionists to confer with the Senate about a bill that the House had never seen and, of course, never disagreed with the Senate about, the leaders of the combination, in order to make it impossible for any Senator to be a conferee on the part of the Senate who proposed in good faith to sustain its action and maintain the provisions of the bill it had passed, they ordered their conferees to tell the conferees on the part of the Senate that, in the opinion of the House, the action of the Senate in passing the tariff legislation it had was unconstitutional, and therefore null and void, and after they had done so, if necessary, which meant if the Senate had appointed conferees who proposed in good faith to do their duty and sustain the action of the Senate, they were to report to the House in regard to these constitutional objections. That action was kept separate from the resolution appointing conferees, so as not to drive off their allies, if such were appointed Senate conferees. In plain English, the protectionists in both Houses determined to defeat the Senate bill, but they were afraid of the people, and could not trust their Representatives in the lower House. The leading protectionists in the Senate were the secret enemies of the Senate bill, and they soon proved that they were only too glad to abandon the measure the Senate appointed them as its representatives to defend in the conference. Senator BAYARD and myself laid the facts before the Senate, and declined to be parties to such a transaction, and the Senate sustained us.

Of course no Democrat would serve. The bill of the Senate was at the mercy of its enemies, and in secret conclave they so far disregarded the known will of a majority of both Houses as to make a bill which would suit the most exacting of the high protectionists. That done, as a matter of course the constitutional objection was not raised by the House conferees; all parties had secured all they wanted. The conference report had to be voted on as a whole; the relief given by the repeal of internal-revenue taxation saved it, as they knew it would. It was the most shameless combination to override and disregard the rights and interests of the people that was ever successfully perpetrated. Yet the perpetrators of these wrongs have the audacity now to denounce all attempts to modify or repeal any of the burdens they, not Congress, imposed upon the country under such circumstances. I hope the Democratic party will accept the issue they tender, and lay bare their conduct in every nook and corner of the land. That done, there will be an end of such legislation, and new men will fill the places of the perpetrators of that great wrong in these halls. The methods adopted to get these (so-called) conferees appointed, coupled with the resolution denouncing the Senate's action, which they knew would drive from it any Senators who respected the rights of the Senate, were bolder usurpations of power and more reckless violations of the precedents which had always controlled legislation than even the substitution of Mr. Hayes for Mr. Tilden by the Electoral Commission.

These proceedings soon developed how little regard the great protected combinations of wealth and power, made rich and potent from the taxation they had secured for their private emolument, had for law, precedent, or justice. When they saw that Senators and Representatives were determined to curtail their subsidies they did not look to Congress or either branch of it for support. They defied both. The conference committee was their reliance. They knew that the men who controlled that conference in both Houses were their friends. Whenever any bill got into their hands on any terms they knew that their conferees would set the action of either House or of both Houses at defiance. I say their conferees because the report they made was infinitely more oppressive on the people wherever they made changes than the Senate bill was, and in many important regards far more so than the partial action of the House warranted upon the schedules on which it had acted. It increased the burdens of taxation largely on important classes of goods when there were no disagreeing votes between the two Houses, indeed when both had agreed to lower rates. It added new paragraphs with increased rates of taxation to both the woolen and cotton schedules that neither House had ever seen or heard of; it increased taxation on many articles of prime necessity to the poorest of our people, even beyond the highest war rates.

In short, that conference committee violated every principle of law, justice, and precedent, and now they and their partisans make the issue before the country that all the outrages it was guilty of shall be sustained and approved. The Democratic party has accepted that issue. We denounced it in both Houses at the time. We are seeking now to modify if we can not undo the wrongs they committed. We will appeal to the people if we fail here. It is, I repeat, the great overshadowing issue of the opening campaign. It will not down at anybody's bidding. No flank movements on Danville riots, Copiah murders, Tewksbury horrors, or Cincinnati riots or "burkings" will divert the American people from passing upon the injustice and the wrong both of the matter and the manner of the legislation of March 3, 1883, which we will insist and prove was not imposed upon the country in any proper sense by Congress, or either branch of it, but against the known will of both branches by a conference committee acting in the interest of protected monopolists, and in utter disregard of the rights and interests of the people. I know that the protectionists derive great comfort from our apparent hesitation and division. Of course we will have some stragglers, but we will get ten recruits for each straggler, and they will enlist for the war. Does any one suppose that any Democratic constituency will indorse any man who supports, maintains, or defends the work of that conference committee and avows his determination to perpetuate the oppressive burdens it has imposed and seeks to fasten upon the country? Or that the Democratic national convention will fail to denounce the policy and practice of these oppressors? Or that we either can or ought to shrink from the responsibility of meeting that issue? Or that we can decently ask the people to turn the dominant party out of power if we propose to continue their policy, or if we dare not say we oppose it? The people despise hypocrisy, and they ought to.

If the protectionists are to be sustained in their subsidies, obtained and retained by false pretenses and revolutionary proceedings, let it be done after an open, honest, manly resistance. Sneaks and cowards never command respect. If there are Democrats who sustain that "conference bill" and its taxation, let them so vote and avow. We can stand defeat in a good cause, with justice and right on our side. Our principles may be crushed to earth; they will rise again, and rise with renewed strength. The young men of the country are all studying political economy; all the trash and clap-trap of sectionalism is now clearing away, and the two great parties stand arrayed against each other on the issue of a protective or a revenue tariff—one seeking to tax all to enrich favored classes under the pretense of protecting infant industries that were old and well-established before they were born; the other demanding equal and just laws, which impose only such taxation on capital and labor as will produce revenue sufficient to support an economical administration of the Federal Government. Young men will array themselves under the Democratic banner; they will repeal the barbarous navigation laws, utilize the ocean highway, and pull down the walls erected to protect the barons and their retainers. They are the men I am looking to to fill up the ranks of the Democracy and control the future policy of the country.

Returning to the action of the conference: I said the Senate conferees were opposed to the measure they were selected by the Senate as its representatives to defend and sustain. Mr. SHERMAN, in the interview from which I read, charged that his New England colleagues, Messrs. MORRILL and ALDRICH, controlled the conference in the interest of the cotton and woolen manufacturers, and increased the taxation on certain grades of these important classes of goods in that conference. He alleges that although the woolen manufacturers themselves had prepared the woolen schedule, the New England conferees in the conference committee increased the taxation on both woolen and cotton goods far in advance of the then existing law. I had better read what he said, as I regard the charges he made as very serious reflections on his colleagues; at least I would so regard them if made in relation to my action as a Senator, bound to disregard any personal opinions and wishes of my own, and compelled, from the nature of the obligation I had assumed, to sustain the action of the Senate, whether I liked it or not. Mr. SHERMAN said:

By the new tariff the whole reduction falls on the wool-grower. It is true there is a reduction of the specific duty on woolens equal to the reduction on wool, but that only leaves the manufacturer in statu quo, while the former loses one-fifth of his protection. The protective duty of 35 per cent. ad valorem in favor of the manufacturer remains unchanged, and in important branches is changed to 40 per cent.; and the classification is so changed that none but an expert can understand it. Even in the conference committee additional duties were put on both cotton and woolen goods of certain grades far in advance of existing law. The wool-growers, who did not understand in the beginning what was going on, felt, and still feel, no doubt, that their interests were sacrificed by a reduction of duties on wool without a corresponding reduction on woolens, and with an absolute increase on some grades.

It will be observed that there is no suggestion in these allegations of Mr. SHERMAN that the tax on woolen and cotton goods was increased on the demand or even by request of the House conferees. The intimation, if not the allegation, is that the New England Senate conferees had it done; indeed, the House conferees could not well make any suggestion as to either the cotton or woolen schedules, as they had not been reached or even read in the House when its bill was abandoned on the 17th of February, as I have already stated. Speaking of himself and his own relations to the measure passed by the Senate, and his feelings in regard to it, Mr. SHERMAN shows that he was only too glad to be placed in a position to undo what the Senate had done; only too happy to surrender all the reductions the Senate had made, his only regret being that he could not get his colleagues to be absolutely faithless to their trust. He said:

My hope had been that the bill would be greatly improved in conference. The House conferees were right on all these disputed points.

This occurred:

CORRESPONDENT. What effect upon the conference had the withdrawal of Senators BAYARD and BECK?

Senator SHERMAN. I can not say that it had any except to enable the conferees to patch up a little the iron schedule, as I have already stated. But their withdrawal gave the Republican conferees the opportunity of reporting and proposing a thoroughly protective tariff bill, just and harmonious in all its rates.

Again he said:

The conferees would not take this responsibility, and accordingly left the rates named and some others palpably unjust, and have opened the door to contests in the future. If these errors had been corrected the bill would have received every Republican vote in the Senate. The struggle over the bill proved that the Democratic party was hostile to the policy of protection, though occasionally a Democratic Senator voted with us to protect his local industry. The system must stand or fall with the Republican party. We might, in the way stated, have made a square political issue, which I always prefer to do rather than to lean on my political adversaries for occasional votes.

Mr. MORRILL answered Mr. SHERMAN, in a labored article, dated April 28, and published in the New York Tribune. He confesses and avoids the truth of the charges. His main defense is that Mr. SHERMAN was as deep in the mud as he was in the mire. I admit it. Both did their best to show their want of due respect for the expressed will of the Senate, although neither of them had any right to undertake the trust of sustaining the action of the body that appointed them, unless they were determined to maintain and unphold its action by every honorable means, whether they approved it or not. It is painfully apparent from their own statements that neither of them either did so or attempted to do so. Mr. MORRILL says:

The distinguished Senator is a remarkably cool and sagacious man, but he was evidently in a pet, and by this time he will regret some of his rather exaggerated and hasty statements. He criticises the fact that two members of the conference committee were from New England, and would seem to indicate that this brought to bear a malign sectional influence, forgetting that two of the members of the conference committee were from the State of Ohio alone, and perhaps, too, sensitively remembering that the large increase of duties on plain white crockery-ware had never been insisted upon in the Senate by New England.

Again, he says:

But the Senator complains that the duties on woolens were raised in the conference committee; so they were on pig and bar iron.

Again, he says:

Only a proviso was inserted in the conference committee by which a special class of cotton cloth should be subject to a duty of 40 per cent., which is the same or a little less than the existing law.

And adds:

This is not much above the rate fixed on pig-iron, and can hardly be called a local favor.

These interviews show that the conferees, so called, paid no sort of respect to the wishes of the two Houses. They made the tariff we are now cursed with to suit themselves. One accuses the other of increasing the burdens on cotton and woolen goods, and the other retaliates by charging his accuser with having increased the taxes on earthenware, pig and bar iron, and other things in the iron schedule which the Senate had over and over again defeated him in when he attempted to impose them upon the country on this floor.

Mr. MORRILL adds:

The Senator sought to raise in the Senate the rates fixed in committee on pig-iron; and, not succeeding, he joined Senator BROWN, of Georgia, in cutting down generally the rates upon bar-iron and upon steel railway bars; for as he correctly observes, "a single Republican Senator voting with the Democrats could reduce the duty." A restoration of these rates, even in a committee of conference, was an unpromising risk. If any one was more responsible than Senator SHERMAN for making the "harmony and symmetry of the plan" of the commission's iron schedule "as rough as a saw" I do not remember it.

He was right in saying that—

A restoration of these duties, even in such a conference committee, was an unpromising risk.

The Senate bill had passed on the 22d day of February by a vote of 42 to 19; yet the conference report was passed by a vote of only 32 to 31.

Again, he said:

Some of the defects, though few, and some of them temporary, excite my disgust and would have been remedied if there had been time and votes enough in the Senate for proper correction, but we had neither, and may not have for some time to come.

Again, Mr. MORRILL says:

The bill has become the law of the land, and few will dispute that the shape which it assumed in the committee of conference was better than what was reported from the Senate Committee on Finance, or than what was sent by the Senate to the House.

He adds:

And twenty years may elapse before the country will have anything more satisfactory.

Fifty per cent. increase on common crockery, 50 per cent. on iron ore, nearly 30 per cent. on all the unenumerated manufactures of iron and steel, 25 per cent. on many classes of woolen goods, with an average increase of $2.46 per $100 on the manufactures of cotton over the high protective war-tariff taxes, which the Senator and his allies so often and so solemnly pledged the country should be reduced, is the grand result which we are assured is all we can hope for for twenty years.

I know that the details I have felt it necessary to lay before the Senate have been tedious, perhaps improperly so, but I desire the people outside of this Senate to understand the facts. I said repeatedly last winter that I knew that a bill worse for the tax-payers of this country than either the Senate or House desired would finally be imposed upon them by a conference committee in the interests of the protected classes. I knew from the beginning that all the professions of reduction of burdens would prove to be mere false pretenses, and therefore I insisted on discussing and exposing them day by day during all the last session of the last Congress. We made a record then which the country appreciated. I hope the discussion of the Morrison bill may take the widest possible range. The debate will educate the people. All they need is to know the truth. They will have to submit to the exactions and extortions of the conference committee's bill of March 3, 1883, as long as the Republican party remains in power; twenty years, says the leader of the protectionists, is the shortest time within which it can be disturbed.

Men who think they are Democrats and take the position that the Senators from Vermont and Ohio do will find but little comfort inside the Democratic camp after the national convention acts; and Republicans who desire a reduction of taxation may as well unite with us now, or bow their necks to the yoke for twenty years to come. Senators have only to look into the reports made the other day by the Committee on Foreign Relations to ascertain that the leading nations of continental Europe are doing all possible to exclude our hog, beef, and other exports from their markets on all sorts of pretexts; but the true reason is apparent, and it is very clearly set forth in the minority report submitted by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]:

If it be that fear of trichinosis is only a pretext, and that the real reason for excluding our hog products is the desire to protect their own producers, then we are the last people on earth who ought to complain. After surrounding ourselves for more than twenty years with a protective-tariff wall so high as to exclude virtually all the products of Germany which compete with ours, it is rather late for us to advocate retaliation against a government which merely follows our example. In fact, Germany's action is retaliation, and the cry of "Stop thief!" can not change the true condition of things. We have got to learn that we are not so great and independent as to enable us to defy the laws of political economy and the amenities of international trade with impunity.

We have been told again and again that our true policy was to shut up our manufactures from the competiton of the world, and that all the nations thus excluded would be compelled, nevertheless, to buy our breadstuffs and provisions—that they could not do without them. We are greatly surprised and indignant when one important customer says he can get along without our hog products, and forbids their coming in; and we propose to retaliate! For what? For simply and frankly forbidding them to be imported. Suppose, instead of doing this, Germany had imposed a duty of 100 per cent. on them, which as effectually prohibited their importation, what then? Where would be our so-called retaliation? The undersigned can see no difference whatever in the two methods of prohibition, so far as results are concerned, only that the one is manly and direct, while the other is indirect and based on false pretenses.

Our great meat industry must indeed be cared for. It, with kindred agricultural industries, furnishes nearly all of our foreign trade, and they deserve all that Congress can do for them. But this bill does not propose the true way to do it. This way is to remove as far as possible all restrictions upon trade, and to enlarge the markets for our farmers' products all over the world by liberal treaties and tariff laws.

That is the plain common-sense view of the situation.

Our hog exports have fallen off from over $104,000,000 in 1881 to $70,000,000 in 1883. England continues to be our best customer; she has not yet joined in the raid made on our commerce and our agricultural exports by the continental nations, and her demand for cheap food products is rapidly increasing. According to her official tables the value of the food imported into England in 1840 was £27,599,431, in 1880 £164,615,012, an increase of £137,015,581, or $685,000,000, being five times the whole amount imported in 1840. She took from us in 1880 goods, nearly all of them agricultural products, valued at £107,081,260, and we took from her only £37,954,192 worth of manufactures to pay for them. She is struggling to get a larger portion of her food supplies elsewhere, and I fear she will succeed. I have just read a very able article on wages and trade, by Mr. Schoenhof, of New York, in which, after a very exhaustive argument relative to wages and products, he sets forth the efforts of all countries to obtain the necessaries of life cheaply and to trade on fair terms. He says:

Every spot of the globe held by civilized government is now tributary, or likely to become tributary, to the food-wants of any country.

* * * * * * *

To show the possibilities of the yield of the above-mentioned new sources of supply, I may state that the exports of cereals of Russia, Austria, India, Australia, and Canada, which were in 1870 $140,000,000, rose to $350,000,000 in 1880, and although India had not more than 9,875 miles of railroads in 1881, yet her exports of wheat rose from $5,500,000 in 1880 to $43,000,000 in 1882. Meantime our exports in breadstuffs, which were $285,000,000 in 1880, declined to $185,000,000 in 1882, and $207,000,000 in 1883.

I saw it stated somewhere that England got one-third of her breadstuffs from India last year.

These are facts worthy of serious consideration. We can not afford to isolate ourselves from the world's trade and commerce; we are no longer infants in anything; we have grown great rapidly in spite of unjust and unequal tax laws. We had empires in the West to give away and we have given them with a lavish hand to railroads, to settlers from the older States and from all parts of the world. About 600,000 people have for years past immigrated here annually from Europe, the main inducement being to take up the lands we had thrown open. Germany has furnished nearly half of them; at least 50,000 men fit for military duty, twice as many as compose the American Army, come here annually from that country. No wonder Prince Bismarck is discontented in view of the relations between Germany and France; no wonder the world is rushing to our shores. No amount of tariff taxation will keep people who are landless and hopeless of ever acquiring farms or freeholds in their own country from coming here and accepting such gifts as we have bestowed.

We are great, and in many regards prosperous, in spite of oppressive taxation, not because of it. Wages in all sorts of industries will, indeed must, always be higher here than elsewhere (no thanks to the manufacturers for it). With a continent open and free to all comers, with homesteads and pre-emptions on public lands held out as inducements to all who will accept them, almost without money and without price, how can it be otherwise? It requires high wages in other occupations to keep men from seeking homes on the free public lands. Our great railroad systems coupled with our land systems increase agricultural products far beyond the possibility of home consumption, and make us more and more dependent on the open markets of the world. Commerce, the handmaid of agriculture, as Mr. Jefferson expressed it, needs fostering care.

We are to-day prostrate at the feet of foreign nations in the markets of the world, almost without a ship or a sailor. Taxation and protection increase the cost of our manufactures so that they form an absolutely insignificant portion of our exports. Machinery now performs for our manufacturers more labor than all the human muscle of the combined world could perform. Far less than half of the number of operatives are now needed to furnish all the manufactures this country can consume than would have been required to produce the results now produced twenty years ago. The home capacity to consume agricultural products is relatively diminishing as machinery takes the place of human labor.

Obviously, we must open foreign markets for our manufactures. Mexico, Central and South America, China, Japan, and the less advanced nations of the world in manufactures are open to our trade, while European nations must take a large amount of our provisions, whether they like it or not; their self-interest regulates that. Reduce taxation, give our people cheap raw materials, liberalize commerce, stop the nonsense of retaliation and prohibition, give our people free ships on free seas, and they will regain a fair share of the world's trade. Then the operatives in our manufacturing establishments, instead of being deluded into the support of protection by temporary high wages for a few weeks or months of high prices at home, to be followed by starvation from closed factories while the glut of overproduction is being worked off, will have 1,500,000,000 consumers whom they can supply, instead of 55,000,000 as now. Then there will be steady work all the year round for twice as many as are now employed by fits and starts, and their wages will be increased in purchasing power at least 25 per cent. These are some of the results I hope to see produced by relief from the burdens of oppressive taxation. High wages and intelligent, well-fed operatives always produce better and cheaper products than ignorant, half-starved paupers can or will. England has doubled the wages of her operatives and the quality and quantity of their food in the last thirty years. She pays, on an average, 50 per cent. higher wages than the continental nations do, and undersells them all, till they are seeking refuge in protective tariffs for their paupers against her skilled workmen. We can pay 30 per cent. more than she does, and with cheap and abundant food and raw material, with the most energetic and intelligent people on earth to manage the machinery that produces the fabrics, we can, at least, secure a large share of the trade of Central and South America and Eastern Asia with its teeming millions.

Mr. President, I repeat, these are the objects I am struggling to reach, and I will not vote for any scheme on any pretext, however plausible, looking to the maintenance of the present system of taxation, which destroys all hope of their accomplishment by appropriating the surplus revenue either to educate negroes or whites; I will leave that to the States and the people. I seek to give both a chance to become prosperous and able to educate their own children by removing all the obstacles to their prosperity which Congress has piled mountain high by the taxation which the Republican leaders are determined to perpetuate. While I would deplore the consequences I foresee as inevitable from Federal interference with education in the States, if it is determined on, I now think that I will vote to provide a fund which shall be set apart to sustain it; which fund can readily be raised without oppressing any one by the imposition of a tax of 1 or 2 per cent. on all incomes exceeding $5,000 a year; that done, we might reduce taxation as I propose. I observe from an article in the New York Herald that Mr. Vanderbilt tells his confidential friends that his property is worth $200,000,000, and his income from it averages 6 per cent., or $12,000,000 a year; 2 per cent. on that is $240,000; and there are hundreds of others who can afford to contribute largely, as they pay no more to support the Federal Government than the men who drive their coaches do. I protest against squandering money wrung from the needs and wants of poverty and labor in order to indulge in pretended schemes of philanthropy and benevolence, when every dollar of the money so given costs the people $5 under our tariff system before it reaches the Treasury.

I will do nothing to furnish an excuse for the maintenance of such a system. I will try to give prompt relief from its oppression, and, if need be, tax the incomes of the rich, whose property and wealth we have to maintain armies and navies to protect against ignorance and vice. Let these men support and maintain the education and intelligence needed to defend their estates.

One word more, and I am done. Perhaps I have given my friend from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] an excuse for saying now what he said yesterday, whether for the purpose of expressing his contempt for my knowledge of these questions or not or for what other purpose I do not know. He then said:

> Right here in the speech of the Senator from Texas on yesterday, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] interposed, whose attention, I have no doubt, was called to this debate by hearing the words "taxation for revenue," for it seems the Senator from Kentucky dreams of "revenue," "taxation for revenue," "tariff for revenue," "sees" it "in clouds," "hears" it "in the wind;" it is his morning lullaby, if I may so say, and his last requiem at night. When those portentous words had been pronounced by the Senator from Texas, "taxation for revenue," the Senator from Kentucky was no longer able to keep his silence, and so he put in an interrogatory which he thought, I suppose, settled the whole principle, and that was this: he asked me if I thought that Congress could donate money to a private individual. If I was to answer that it could not donate money to a private individual, he supposed that he had made out his case; that there was a distinction between land and money.

To begin with, the Senator from Mississippi was mistaken when he said that I interfered in order to ask him a question. I have the RECORD before me. The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] was on the floor, and I said to the Senator from Texas while he was speaking:

> Will the Senator from Texas allow me to make a suggestion?
> Mr. COKE. Certainly.
> Mr. BECK. The Government of the United States can give homesteads to men from all over the world as soon as they declare their intention to become citizens of the United States, and they do it. Can the Government of the United States tax the people to give those foreigners money to buy the land with?

That was the question I put, not to the Senator from Mississippi, but to the Senator from Texas. Then the Senator from Mississippi rose as though he was expected to answer the question, whether it was because it was his special prerogative to instruct everybody or for what other reason I do not know, and said:

> And let me ask, can it tax the people to buy the land out of which it will give the homestead?

He rose to ask that question. I had asked him nothing.

> Mr. BECK. It never did, and never thought of it; but if it acquires the land legitimately, the right to dispose of it comes with the possession. The Government does give homesteads to foreigners, but it can not tax the people to give those foreigners money to buy land with.

Then, after some more wrangling, I did say:

> I did not expect to interfere in the matter, but I will now ask the Senator from Mississippi whether or not this Government has the right to give homesteads of its lands to anybody, and if it has not done it? Has it not?
> Mr. GEORGE. Are you through with your question?
> Mr. BECK. No; that is the first one. I assume that you will answer, "Yes; it has." Now, having done that, having done it rightfully, has the Government the right to tax this people to raise money to give to those men to buy land with?
> Mr. GEORGE. I will take the Yankee way of answering the Senator, by propounding to him another question. If the Government has a right to give land for purposes of homesteads, has it a right to tax the people of this country to raise the money to buy the land to make the gift?

So that the Senator from Mississippi was mistaken in his premise in saying I had interfered to ask him a question.

I will say further that, however he may belittle my anxiety to reduce the revenues of the country down to a revenue standard, it is as respectable for me to devote my time to that and to seek to give relief to the people from one end of the country to the other as it is for him to be devoting his great power and energy to see how to squander the revenue after it is collected upon matters of very doubtful constitutionality.

I had occasion to spend some of the best years of my life in endeavoring to resist the oppressions of the people of the Southern country against the very system that I believe will be inaugurated now if this bill is carried. In the State of Mississippi, with all the pretenses the Republican party made that they were going to educate the negroes, when they had control of that State in 1869 and 1870 and 1871 and education was the cry then as it is now, a man by the name of Cornelius McBride was whipped in the county of Chickasaw. He was an intelligent man, from the State of Maine. He came before us and he showed the marks upon his back. We examined him, and he developed the state of facts that will be shown by his testimony, page 373 of the report of the minority of the so-called ku klux committee. He stated that they had some two hundred schools in the county of Chickasaw; that they paid their schoolmasters from $60 to $100 and $150 a month; that whenever twenty-five children of school age could be got together, white or black, they had a right to demand a school. They had built schoolhouses, had furnished them, and had paid the teachers, and they sold all the property of the people, white and black, to pay their expenses. Going on a little further Mr. Charles Baskerville, one of the most intelligent witnesses we had before us, told all about it. He showed that the whole tax upon his portion of the State was 4 per cent.; that his cotton crop would not pay his tax; and he was one of the most intelligent farmers in that State; that he was one of hundreds similarly situated in the State of Mississippi; and all this for the education of the negro. To make a long story short, the minority of the committee determined that Congress should know the facts, and stated them in the language I will now read. That minority was composed of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], the then Senator from Missouri, General Blair, myself, Mr. COX of New York, Mr. Van Trump of Ohio, and one or two others. This is the language used in regard to these matters:

> Men will endure oppression when they have selected their rulers with much more equanimity than they will when strangers are imposed upon them against their will, especially when those who impose the burdens bear none of them and pocket all they can. The people of Mississippi form no exception to the rule. Take the school-house and school-teacher tax, as described by McBride, in Chickasaw County, as an illustration. There, he says, about two hundred schools were established, and of course two hundred schoolmasters appointed. The proof all shows that there were hardly enough white radicals in that county to fill county offices, a dozen or twenty at the outside. Of course several hundred radical schoolmasters had to be imported. Each one became a political emissary among the negroes who were hired by the whites, or living on rented patches of their plantations; the struggle of each was to get twenty-five little negroes together and obtain a petition from their fathers or mothers to the school board for the erection of a school-house, and his appointment as their preceptor; for it must be remembered from reading McBride's evidence that the law gave an absolute right to the parents of each twenty-five negro children, no matter whether they paid a dollar of tax or not, no matter though they might be living on another man's place and only there for a limited time, to have a school-house furnished and a schoolmaster appointed for their accommodation.
> These learned gentlemen, when appointed, would not put up with ordinary buildings which could be erected at cheap rates, but required handsome edifices, bells, and walnut furniture brought from Cincinnati and elsewhere. These edifices, thus furnished, were being erected everywhere; they cost from $500 to $1,000 each, and the law authorized the employment of teachers for ten months in the year in Chickasaw County at an average of $60 a month; in other counties the average was $100 a month. If the scheme had been consummated in Chickasaw, which we give merely as a sample, furnished by an intelligent radical witness, the cost for the year 1871 would have been $100,000 for school-houses, at $500 each, or $200,000, at $1,000 average, which is nearer the truth, and at least $120,000 for schoolmasters, at an average of $60 a month, beside all the expenses of the county machinery necessary to put the system into operation.
> Mr. Baskerville testified that it took all the cotton he made in 1870 to pay his taxes, and he was one of the largest and most energetic of the planters of Noxubee County. All others were in the same condition. The poorer classes suffered most; they were without money and their taxes had to be made by sale of their horses, corn, furniture, or whatever else could be found to sell. It requires no stretch of imagination to understand the feelings this state of the case would produce among a people who had been reduced to poverty by the war, whose crops for several years after peace was declared had proved failures or had been sold at such low rates as hardly to pay taxes.

When I recollect the condition of things that we found in South Carolina and elsewhere as well as in Mississippi, that those Republicans, in their zeal to get control of the negro vote, perpetrated such outrages in the State of Mississippi by means of education, and where they brought ruin upon them all and almost a war of the races, I am not prepared to support the pending measure. I know the Senators from the South are looking upon this matter from a different standpoint from what I look at it. I never trust men twice. The Republican party had control of the Southern States for a time, and ruin, desolation, and bankruptcy followed in the track of their rule. The Democratic party have had control of those States for the last six or eight years, and they have advanced in all the elements of greatness. I do not want the Republican party to get their hands on the throats of those people any more on any pretense whatever; and when the Senator from Mississippi refers to me as having tariff for revenue on the brain, and seeing it by night and by day, dreaming and thinking of nothing else, I beg to assure him that it is because I believe that the reduction of taxes, the opening up of trade and commerce, is the true way to bring prosperity to his people, instead of the means that he thinks are the best to adopt. I am as urgent as he is to have my views relative to taxation adopted, but not because of any dislike or ill-will either to the system of education or to the people of the South or any other part of the country, but because the intervention of the Federal Government in any form with local State affairs is vicious.

Mr. WILLIAMS obtained the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. I hope I may be allowed a word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir; for a short time, for an explanation.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am astonished at the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]. In the jocular allusion I made to him yesterday I did not mean in any way to belittle or depreciate his knowledge of the tariff. The Senator very well knows that I have the highest admiration for his wonderful knowledge upon the various details of the tariff subject. But, sir, though I may say that the expression used by me yesterday everybody understood but the Senator to be purely jocular, it does seem to have some justification and verification from the fact that on the very next day after I made it the Senator from Kentucky has occupied not too long but several hours of the time of the Senate, which ought to be devoted to the consideration of this bill, in the discussion of the tariff, which has no more to do with this bill than it has to do with any other bill that might come up in this body.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought the Senator wished to make a personal explanation.

Mr. GEORGE. Am I not making it? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator is starting to make an elaborate speech, apparently.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky is entitled to the floor if he resumes it.

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator from Kentucky, when his colleague spoke ten, fifteen, or twenty minutes about me, will not allow me time to reply, be it so; I shall seek another opportunity.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have every disposition in the world to oblige the Senator, but I fear the Senate will soon be disposed to adjourn.

Mr. President, may I ask what is the pending question? [Laughter.]

Mr. HAWLEY. I think it is the bad behavior of both parties.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am in earnest in asking the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to recommit the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The educational bill? [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, may I ask what is the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to recommit the bill to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thank the Chair for the information.

I have listened so long and with so much pleasure to the very able tariff speech of my colleague, and by the irresistible force of his logic been carried so far out to sea, that I lost my reckoning and required some help to get back to port and to collect my thoughts and concentrate them on the question before the Senate. It is not my purpose to enter into anything like a lengthy discussion of the subject. It has been discussed already for three weeks, and certainly I can not hope to add anything to the discussion of the constitutional aspect of the question. We have had able and profound arguments from the ablest lawyers in this body, and I could add nothing, I am sure, to what has been said. But while we have been entertained to a treat of law and eloquence, I do not think we made much progress toward a settlement of what really is the law of the case.

I will not attempt to add anything to the argument upon the constitutionality of this measure, for I think that the arguments of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] and the Senators from Mississippi have never been answered by any gentleman on the opposite side.

One word only as to this matter of the general welfare. I would ask, if nothing was to be done for the general welfare by the Congress of the United States in any contingency, why is it placed so prominently in the Constitution itself? You find it, sir, in the very forefront of the Constitution. You find in the preamble that the chief purpose for which this Constitution was made and for which a better Union was desired was to provide for the common defense and for the general welfare; and in that clause of the Constitution giving to Congress power over the subject of taxation, the very highest prerogative of sovereignty, the power to tax, was limited to three purposes, in these words:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises—

to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

These words are words of limitation upon the power to tax, and but for them the taxing power would have been absolute. I take that to be clear. Congress has power to tax but for these three purposes, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and the general welfare. Now, may I ask, if Congress has the power to impose taxes for the general welfare, has it not the power to apply them? Who shall say what are the objects to which the taxes thus collected shall be applied?

While it is true that the power to provide for the general welfare is not a distinct affirmative power enumerated among the granted powers in the Constitution, neither is the power to provide for the public defense. They are the two great purposes for which this Constitution was formed. They are generic, broad; they embrace every other power granted to Congress or to any Department or officer of the Government; they cover the whole. It is irresistible logic. I know that Southern statesmen always clung during the prevalence of slavery to the strictest construction of the Constitution. They did that to defend their slave property. They maintained that Congress had no power to do anything whatever under the general-welfare clause, and they maintained this through thirty-five years of angry and bitter discussion in the Halls of Congress. I think they persuaded themselves into the conviction, as men very often do, and maintained it until the conflict of opinion resulted in a disastrous war, in which they lost both slaves and their theory.

Mr. MORGAN. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course I yield.

Mr. MORGAN. Were they not honest in their opinion?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am satisfied they persuaded themselves—they absolutely believed in an erroneous view.

Mr. MORGAN. An honest view.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No doubt it was honest; I am satisfied about that; but there is no denying the fact that the general-welfare clause is in the Constitution, and it is there to stay, and the only way to get clear of it is to amend the Constitution and strike it out, as the confederate convention at Montgomery, Ala., did when they made their constitution.

Now, sir, I take it that all proper governmental powers are vested somewhere. Under our dual system, those of a local character and application by the Constitution were reserved to the States; those of a general character, that could not be attended to so well by the States in their several independent capacities, were granted to the common Government. Therefore the local welfare was left to the States, and the general welfare was intrusted to the National Government. These are my views.

Every government must possess some elasticity, some power of expansion to adapt itself to the growth of a nation. If it were not so, this Constitution of ours would not have stood through two generations of men. It would be as ridiculous to expect a fully grown man to wear the clothes of his boyhood as for a nation of 60,000,000 of active and restless people like our own, with their hundreds of cities, with all their varied industries and complicated commercial relations, moving forward with that accelerated speed which electricity and steam have imparted to modern progress, to be controlled and governed by the simple rules which were ample for two or three millions of peaceful farmers scattered over the thirteen original colonies that composed the Union at the time of the formation of the Government.

Sir, the enumerated powers granted to the General Government are very few in number in the Constitution. There is no attempt at an enumeration of the reserved powers. The lines between Federal and State jurisdiction are not always very clearly defined or strongly marked, and when a conflict comes the true interpretation is, if the question is too big to be handled by a State then it becomes a national one and comes under the jurisdiction of Congress.

I do not know how these views may strike the learned doctrinaires of the law, but they are the views of common sense, and sometimes common sense arrives as near at the proper conclusion of a law question as the ablest and most learned lawyer, sometimes even more so, as my able friend on my right [Mr. RANSOM] says.

But, Mr. President, I did not propose to discuss the constitutionality of this measure. We have been led away from it. This debate has taken a range as wide as the famous debate on the Foote resolutions. It has embraced not only the economic concerns of our own country, but has gone into our foreign relation and has hardly touched the question for the last week or ten days. The whole time of the Senate has been occupied in discussing the constitutionality, and not the merits of the bill.

A great many objections have been urged to it. I listened to my colleague's speech. There is nothing in it to which I am required to reply because he did not touch the pending bill at all except simply to say that it was a corrupting measure and when we got it through and got the money into the South they would want Republican carpet-baggers down there to take charge of our schools. Mr. President, this has been the cry for thirty years whenever there was a proposition for the Government to make any grant of land or money to the people; it has been said that it would be a bribe to the States, an entering-wedge for the Federal Government to control State institutions and State authority; but we all know how much we have got from the National Government. My State has two splendid colleges that owe their endowment entirely to it, and there has been no interference by the Federal Government. Not one of the friends of this measure on the other side has favored such interference; the very leader himself has declared against it. The bill does not propose that the National Government shall follow this money into the States and take control of the schools.

Mr. President, this is a proposition so manifestly humane and just that it is difficult for me to see how anybody can withhold his support from it. Whatever objections Senators may have to the details of this measure, not one of them can withhold his sympathy from the noble purpose of the bill, which is to enlighten the ignorant masses of our people by placing within the reach of every child, black and white, in this whole country the means of a common-school education. The bill proposes to distribute among the States upon the basis of illiteracy about $105,000,000, beginning with $15,000,000 the first year, $14,000,000 for the next, and reducing on down by the sum of $1,000,000 a year until the whole term is covered. This fund is to be turned over to the State authorities, to be by them applied through their own educational machinery to the purpose of common-school education, and not, as the opponents of the bill on this side of the House declare, to be controlled by the Federal Government.

And yet, sir, a bill so philanthropic, so patriotic as this, meets with very determined and resolute opposition in the American Senate. Some of the gentlemen oppose it on the ground of constitutional objections, others upon grounds of policy and expediency, and others again upon the ground that they are not willing to trust the Southern people with the distribution among their children of their portion of the fund. My able friend the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] said that he had grave doubts as to the constitutionality as well as policy of the bill, and that he would give the benefit of his doubts to the Treasury of the United States.

I have no doubts in regard to this matter at all, either as to the constitutionality or as to the wisdom of the measure; and if I had, I should give the benefit of those doubts not to a plethoric treasury, but to the poor, ignorant human souls living and dying in ignorance and vice. I would try to throw some rays of light into the dark cells of their prison-house that might bring them up to a higher plane of manhood and freedom.

Ah, sir, our fathers who framed our system had no doubts or scruples on this subject. They founded a republic and based it upon the intelligence and virtue of the people, and hence we find it to have been the steady policy of every administration and the cherished purpose of all leading statesmen from Washington down to encourage by every means in their power the dissemination of useful knowledge among the people. They gave away vast portions of the public domain, that most magnificent inheritance with which God ever blessed a people. They gave it to endow universities, colleges, high schools, and even common schools, for I may say without exaggeration that the whole school system of this country is founded upon national endowment.

But it is said that there is a wide difference between land and money. I must confess that my perceptions are too dull to perceive the nice gossamer thread of that argument. The men who heretofore opposed the grants of land never saw any distinction, and if you will read the debate on the proposition to grant land for the agricultural colleges, if you will read the veto message of Mr. Pierce, vetoing the measure appropriating public lands for the erection of insane asylums in the different States, you will see that no distinction was then made. Yet Senators now say that there is a wide distinction. I will just read one short paragraph from the veto of Mr. Pierce, to be found in the Congressional Globe, part 1, second session Thirty-fifth Congress, pages 714 and 715. He says:

> I have been unable to discover any distinction, on constitutional grounds or grounds of expediency, between an appropriation of $10,000,000 directly from the money in the Treasury for the object contemplated and the appropriation of lands presented for my sanction; and yet I can not doubt that if the bill proposed $10,000,000 from the Treasury of the United States for the support of the indigent insane in the several States the constitutional question involved in the act would have attracted forcibly the attention of Congress.
> I respectfully submit that in a constitutional point of view it is wholly immaterial whether the appropriation be in money or in land.

Then there was no difference. Now, if the precedent of seventy or eighty years has established that Congress may grant lands, how can these strict-construction lawyers find a wide distinction between land and money? There is no distinction. Whose land was it that they gave away? Whose money do we propose to give? The people's money. The public domain was achieved by the common blood and common treasure of all the people; and when the Government gives it back to them for purposes of education or any general public purpose, it returns to them that which was already their own; and when we distribute a surplus in the Treasury for the purpose of educating the illiterate people of the country, we but return to the people that which was theirs. To whom does the money belong? To whom does the land belong? The people, not the Government. The Government is a pauper. It holds everything in trust for the use and benefit of the people. There is no humiliation, there is no degradation, there is no corruption, there is no loss of manly independence by accepting from the Government that which is your own and which the Government holds only in trust for you.

Mr. President, the provision of this bill to distribute the fund upon the basis of illiteracy instead of Federal numbers is a proposition conceived in a spirit of the broadest statesmanship and philanthropy. It is a voluntary surrender by the richer and better-educated States to the poorer and more illiterate ones of immense advantages in the distribution; and it can not be denied, for it is obvious, that by this magnanimity of the North the people of the South will get the lion's share of this munificent endowment, and I can not see how it is possible for a Southern Senator to withhold from his ignorant people this magnificent benefaction.

This inequality of distribution is not only a magnanimous concession from the better-educated States to the more illiterate ones, but it is founded upon principles of justice because of the inequality of the burdens to be borne.

Now, what are the facts? That by the war between four and five millions of half-civilized slaves were manumitted, very few of whom could read or write. They were invested with freedom before they had intelligence enough to understand the value of that blessing. They were made citizens before they were instructed in the duties and responsibilities of American citizenship. They were armed with the ballot before they were taught the use of that formidable weapon for good or for evil, and the control and the teaching and the education of all this dense mass of ignorance fell upon seven or eight millions of Southern whites, impoverished and ruined by a desolating war, in which they lost all their property, in which half their young men perished by the sword, in which their cities and towns were consumed, their fair homes desolated, and even their brood-stock destroyed.

A principal actor in this terrible drama wrote to his commander-in-chief in regard to one of the fairest and most fertile portions of that stricken land in these graphic words: "Desolation reigns over the land; it is indeed a desert, over which a crow may not venture to fly without carrying his rations with him." All the institutions of the South, social, educational, economic, and industrial, were swept away in this universal cataclysm of ruin. After the war came reconstruction, with all its attendant horrors. Vice and ignorance came to the front and took control of the State governments, while virtue and intelligence were thrust into the background and disfranchised. Hordes of hungry, needy adventurers in the shape of carpet-baggers came down from the North upon these defenseless people, and the robber took what the sword had spared.

The overthrow of the labor system made the negroes idle, lazy, and vagrant in their habits. They did not feel that they could enjoy their freedom upon the old plantations, and they wandered off to the towns or roamed over the country, seeing the sights, attending political meetings, drinking mean whisky, and saving the country generally. They seemed to think that the country owed them a living, and that they should have it without labor. They thought the Freedmen's Bureau was to support them in idleness as long as they lived. They waited a long while in vain for the "mule and forty acres," and when the bureau was abolished and the rations stopped then for the first time they began to see that the black man as well as the white man could not escape the law of Almighty God, that "in the sweat of his face man should eat his bread all the days of his life." When they found this out they came back to the old plantations and went to work.

This negro property had constituted half the wealth of the Southern people, and with its loss the land deteriorated in value from 60 to 90 per cent., and in many instances even more than that, and even that the carpet-bagger undertook to confiscate by excessive taxation.

Mr. President, after all these calamities and the frequent visitations of yellow fever and overflow we must admit that the cup of misery of the Southern people was filled to the brim, that no people in all history were so sorely tried as they have been, and that they should have made any progress at all, that they should have worked or striven, that they should have preserved their manhood, is a marvel; but we have it upon the best authority, the authority of the ablest educator of the North and South, that to-day in every Southern State of this Union there is in operation a system of common schools with all the machinery necessary to make them as efficient as the schools in any State of the Union, and all that is wanting to give them that efficiency is more money with which to run them.

Now, sir, by the terms of this bill the people of the South will get three-fourths of the fund.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. Is it his opinion that if the number of schoolmasters and the number of school-houses had been doubled during the calamitous period he talks about the negroes of the South would have been benefited?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do believe education makes a negro a better citizen and a better laborer, makes anybody better, for I have tried it myself on my own farm; and I tell you that an intelligent man is worth twice as much as an ignorant man as a laborer. See the difference between the negroes down South and in Kentucky, where all of them have more or less education, for education is not confined to the school-house; it is derived also from association with intelligent people. Education comes from that as well as from the school-house. Our negroes in Kentucky have intelligence enough to manage any machinery, let me tell the Senator from Alabama. In my country you find a great many blacksmiths, plasterers, and carpenters are negroes; they can work all farm machinery. They are the best coachmen we have.

Mr. President, there is no people in this country more anxious for the advancement and education of the negro than the people of the South. It is to them a necessity. They know that he must be educated; he must be civilized, or he will go back to barbarism. They know this perfectly well; and everybody down South understands that intelligence will make a man, black or white, a better citizen and a better laborer.

I am sorry that my friend the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is not in his seat, for I regretted the other day to hear him express himself in terms of such distrust of the justice and fairness of the Southern people as to say he would not trust them with the disposition of their portion of this fund. He wholly misstates the race prejudice at the South, for every man who knows the negro as well as I do, or half as well as I do, knows well that there is far more prejudice at the North against the negro than there is at the South. The negroes understand this themselves. Whenever one gets into trouble he flies at once to the old master for help. He goes to the Southern man first. "True as gospel," I hear a gentleman say. There is no doubt about that; and to say that the Southern people are prejudiced against the negro is a wide mistake.

To say that the object of the Congress of the United States in granting this aid to the common schools is to make a political machine of them is trifling with the question. It is an insult to American statesmanship to say it. There is no such purpose. There is more opposition on the Republican side to this bill at this moment than there is on the Democratic side. Too many of you are afraid to intrust us with the management of this fund. That is the only trouble. You all sympathize with the great purpose of the bill, which is to lift the ignorant children of the country from ignorance and darkness.

Mr. President, there is nothing in the objections as to the influence of the Federal Government over these schools. Why has it not taken control of the universities and colleges and public schools out West and down South? Nearly all the great schools in my State were founded on the distribution of money and land from the Federal Treasury. The Federal Government has never attempted to interfere with our deaf and dumb asylum or our agricultural university, and the very foundation of Kentucky's common-school system to-day is her portion of the distribution of the surplus in the Treasury in 1837. We have added to it year by year by taxation, by turning in various sources of revenue the State had from fines and penalties, and her share of the turnpikes and railroads and things of that sort. She has put them all into the common-school fund, and we have now about $1,300,000 annually to appropriate, and when we get a million from the Federal Treasury under this bill our schools will go on advancing.

It is nonsense to say that this donation will destroy and damage in the end the common schools. You might as well say that it is bad policy to give a young man just starting in life a few hundred dollars, because it will make him dependent upon his father and destroy his manly self-reliance. No, sir; there is nothing in all that. Start these schools into successful operation, and before the period runs round when the aid will terminate their success will be so marked and universal that all will be willing to tax themselves to continue the advantages of the system.

Sir, the three great civilizers of the world to-day are the Gospel, the school-house, and the railroad. When you shall have carried these great agencies of modern civilization into all the dark nooks and corners of the land you will have placed your institutions upon firm foundations.

Sir, there can be no real freedom where ignorance and prejudice prevail. The thraldom of the taskmaster is not half so galling as the bondage of ignorance and vice. The one enslaves the freedom of the body, the other enslaves the immortal soul.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, when the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] who first addressed the Senate sat down I did propose to say something; but the admirable speech of the last Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] who has spoken has nearly driven out of my mind the speech made by the first Senator. I must say that I had supposed we should not proceed to discuss the tariff question until some tariff bill was before us, but the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has brought it in here to-day, as he often has done heretofore, and as I presume he will again. I believe that the Senator from Kentucky was born left-handed.

Mr. President, a single word in relation to one or two points of his speech. The fact of the Senator seizing this opportunity to address the Senate on the tariff seems to be an indication that he was doubtful about having an opportunity of discussing it when it is legitimately and regularly in order. Indeed, he expresses himself as somewhat doubtful whether the tariff bill of Mr. MORRISON will ever reach the Senate. But I should not dare to give the country encouragement from these doubts exhibited and expressed by the Senator from Kentucky. If it could be announced to the public that that bill was not to come to the Senate I think it would be the greatest measure of relief that the country has had for some considerable time.

At the present time we look abroad, and we find that almost every species of property is being depressed and going lower day by day in point of price or value. It is so with agricultural products, it is so with manufactures, and it is so with stocks. I had a letter this morning from Saint Louis from one of the first merchants there, in which it was stated that business there was fair, and but for the agitation and uncertainty as to the action of the House on the tariff the writer thought they would get along prosperously.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky of course has made an able speech, as he always does, and it has been decorated with the usual amount of classic quotations from speeches made on this side of the Chamber which he most frequently presents. So far as his castigation or whipping of myself was concerned, I must say very much in the words of the little boy who was being flogged by his own mother, and when he cried she asked him why he was crying. "Why," said he, "I think, mother, your strength begins to fail; you don't strike me so hard as you used to." [Laughter.]

But, Mr. President, he recovered his strength when he came to deal with the recusants of the Democratic party, and intimated that they were sneaks and cowards if they did not support the Morrison bill, and again I thought he recovered it a little when he got after the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

But, Mr. President, there is one great error in the whole statement of the Senator from Kentucky that I can not forbear even at this late hour to refer to, and that is in relation to the amount of percentage of the present tariff compared with the tariff before the last act was passed. If you will take the amount of our importations as they were before the 30th day of June, 1883, and compute the amount of the tariff upon them, you will find that the estimated rate of reduction from the then existing tariff was not very far from being accurate. It is the fall in prices that has made the difference between the estimate then and what turns out perhaps to be the fact now; that is to say, iron, Bessemer-steel rails, every description of woolen goods, every description of cotton goods, have gone down in price, and wherever the duty is levied as a specific, of course when you come to translate it into an ad valorem it will appear as a greater percentage.

But, Mr. President, I mainly rose to say this, that the Senator from Kentucky having brought this subject before the Senate on a question that was wholly inappropriate, I trust the Senate will hereafter give me, if no other Senator chooses to discuss it, an opportunity to make some sort of reply to quite a number of the propositions that were presented by the Senator from Kentucky, and I promise that I will not take half as long in preparing a speech as was taken by the Senator from Kentucky, and I hope not more than half as long as he occupied the attention of the Senate in delivering it.

Mr. BAYARD obtained the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator from Delaware to yield to me while I give notice of some amendments which I wish to have printed.

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendments will be received and printed.

Mr. HOAR. I will not detain the Senate with having these amendments read at length if they may be printed in the RECORD and also printed formally in document form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be printed in the RECORD if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The amendments of Mr. HOAR are as follows:

Amend section 1, line 3, by striking out "ten" and inserting "eight."

Further amend section 1 by striking out the words after "to wit," in line 5, down to and including the words "shall cease," in line 11, and inserting in lieu thereof:

"The first year the sum of $7,000,000, the second year the sum of $10,000,000, the third year the sum of $15,000,000, the fourth year the sum of $13,000,000, the fifth year the sum of $11,000,000, the sixth year the sum of $9,000,000, the seventh year the sum of $7,000,000, the eighth year the sum of $5,000,000."

Strike out all the eleventh section after the word "child," in line 7, and insert: "Without distinction of race or color an equal opportunity for education. The term 'school district' shall include all cities, towns, parishes, and all corporations clothed by law with the power of maintaining common schools."

Amend section 5 by striking out all after the word "laws," in line 6.

In section 2, strike out all after the word "States," in line 6, and insert "such computation shall be made according to the census of 1880."

Mr. HOAR. I wish to say, if I may trespass on the indulgence of the Senator from Delaware, that the principal change that the amendments which I move makes is that instead of beginning with $15,000,000 and then going down to a very small amount, I suppose it may be likely that some of the States may not be prepared to make so large an increase in their expenditure, and will not have the machinery ready the first year, and my amendments propose to give $7,000,000 for the first year; ten millions for the second; fifteen millions for the third, and then to go down, diminishing two millions a year, to five millions, when the grant is to stop; and it ends in eight years instead of ten, not carrying the operation beyond the census of 1890, when by the bill as it now stands there will be a very small amount to be divided and on an altogether different principle of distribution. This reduces, therefore, the whole amount which this bill provides for from one hundred and five millions to seventy-seven million dollars.

Another amendment which I propose is one which, being merely a change of phraseology, is to require the States to pay as much as they expend. That is already in.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Delaware yield to me?

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. I offered the other day an amendment, which is pending, to the effect that the amount allotted to any State should not exceed the amount expended by that State in the preceding year for school purposes, excluding school buildings. Of course that amendment made necessary some preliminary report from the State in order that the Secretary of the Interior in making the distribution might know how much had been expended in the preceding year, and so make the distribution for the first year. I desire to offer an amendment now that will provide for that preliminary report, and also for striking out entirely from the bill the District of Columbia, upon the idea that we administer directly the law with reference to the District of Columbia now, and that it would simply be confusing things to introduce the District into the bill.

I have not embodied in the amendment which I now present the idea contained in the amendment I suggested the other day, that the distribution should be confined to States having an illiteracy exceeding 10 per cent. I have omitted that feature from this amendment, being of the opinion that if so much money even as is proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts is to be given it should go to all the States, but still upon the basis of the illiteracy of the total population. There are some other changes proposed, but these are the principal ones, and I need not detain the Senate to explain the others. I ask that we may have a reprint of the bill with these amendments and with the amendments offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, so that they may be together before the Senate to-morrow morning.

Mr. FRYE. Let the amendment appear in italics in the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. Let them be printed as separate amendments, not incorporated in the text of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not mean to incorporate them in the text of the bill, to be treated as the text of the bill, but simply that they may be printed with the bill in italics, so that Senators may see just what is stricken out and what is proposed to be inserted, instead of having to refer to line 7, for instance, and see what comes out there and what is inserted and work it out in that way.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposition of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON]? If there be no objection that order will be made, and the bill and amendments will be printed as suggested.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] desires to make a short explanation of his remarks, possibly of yesterday. I shall ask the favor of the Senate of their attention for a short time to-morrow. I desire to express my view upon this measure. I shall not do so to-night. I will therefore yield for the purpose of allowing the explanation to be made by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. BLAIR. In this immediate connection will the Senator from Delaware allow me to say a word? In order to facilitate the desires of Senators I should like to give notice that to-morrow at the close of the morning business I shall move to take up the bill so that the Senator from Delaware may be early heard.

Mr. BAYARD. I shall assist the Senator by my vote for that purpose. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi for the purpose of an explanation.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I was interrupted when I was making the explanation which I thought was due to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]. I wish to add only a word or two to what I have said in reply to the Senator from Kentucky. I desire to repeat my expression of my regret that he should ascribe a remark of mine (made perhaps in a too playful spirit) to a disposition to undervalue his great service to the country on the questions of the tariff. I disclaim any such purpose. Almost at the very moment the Senator entered upon his retort upon me I was expressing to a brother Senator [Mr. SLATER] my admiration of his great and enduring contribution to the thought and learning of the country upon the subject.

In one thing the Senator I have no doubt will, upon reflection, see that he has done me injustice. If he will look again at the debate as it is reported he will find my remarks (alluded to by him) were in reply to a question propounded by him to me, and not, as he stated, to the Senator from Texas.

Sir, if I have said anything in this debate, or if I should at any time say anything unacceptable to him, I hope he will attribute it to the infelicity of extempore speech, or to any cause other than a want of admiration for his talents or respect for his character, or gratitude for essential and great services rendered by him to my own State at a time when she had to rely on others than her own sons to defend her.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 3, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LEAVE TO SIT DURING SESSIONS.

On motion of Mr. MATSON, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was granted leave to sit during the sittings of the House.

LOAN OF FLAGS, BUNTING, ETC.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the introduction and present consideration of a resolution which I believe will not be objected to after it is read.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to loan to the mayor of the city of Richmond, Va., or to such committee as may be appointed by the R. E. Lee camp to receive the same, such flags and bunting as can be conveniently spared, to be used in the decoration of the armory of the First Regiment of Virginia Volunteers on the occasion of a fair to be held there in May, 1884, to raise funds to build a home for maimed and disabled confederate soldiers, with such security for their prompt and safe return as he may deem necessary: Provided, That the transportation of said flags and bunting to and from Richmond shall be without expense to the Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. Res. 223) was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE THOMAS ALLEN.

Mr. BROADHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 1819, to print certain eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Thomas Allen, of Missouri, and put the same upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there be printed of the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Thomas Allen, a member of the Forty-seventh Congress from the State of Missouri, 12,000 copies, of which 4,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 8,000 for the use of the House of Representatives; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to have printed a portrait of said Thomas Allen to accompany said eulogies; and for engraving and printing said portrait the sum of $500, or so much as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BROADHEAD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES H. WOODARD.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 1027, for the relief of James H. Woodard, and put it upon its passage. I will state that a report has been made by the War Claims Committee, through the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES], for a similar bill in the House.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Paymaster-General of the Army is hereby ordered to pay to James H. Woodard, late adjutant of the One hundred and twenty-eighth Regiment of Indiana Volunteer Infantry, the pay and allowances of an adjutant of infantry from the 7th day of March, 1864, to the 22d day of June, 1864. Payment shall be made out of the appropriation for the Army for the present year.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL LABORER IN FILE-ROOM.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask unanimous consent to offer for reference to the Committee on Accounts a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk be authorized to employ a laborer in the file-room, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $30 per month, during the present session.

There being no objection, the resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on Accounts.

INDIAN MASSACRE IN OREGON.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to offer a privileged report from the Committee on Indian Affairs for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the following resolution—

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to make an examination and investigation into the massacre by Indians of Dr. Marcus Whitman and others, in the Columbia River Valley, Oregon, in 1847, and to report to this House the names and ages and sexes of those massacred, and also of all those who survived or escaped said massacre (at said times and places), and now living, with their present places of abode; and what property, kind and value, was destroyed, and to report any and all facts referring to said massacre, and to make such recommendations in the premises as the facts ascertained by him seem to justify"— beg leave to report that the massacre of Dr. Marcus Whitman and others by Indians, in the year 1847, was an event in the history of the early settlement of the Pacific Northwest, and the claims of the survivors are entitled to consideration. There appears to be much valuable information in the Interior Department, and accessible to the officers of the Indian Bureau. Your committee think that all the information should be collected and reported to Congress, both as a matter of record and for such use as may be deemed advisable. Your committee therefore report the resolution back with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXTRA MONTH'S PAY.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave now to call up the joint resolution (H. Res. 66) providing a month's extra compensation to certain employés of the House of Representatives for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, subject to objection.

The joint resolution was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to inquire if that resolution comes from a committee.

Mr. DOCKERY. The resolution is identical in terms with a resolution reported by the Committee on Accounts, which has been referred to the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. REAGAN. I object.

Mr. ELLIS. I demand the regular order.

EMPLOYÉS IN FOLDING-ROOM.

Mr. SPOONER. I rise to make a privileged report. I am directed by the Committee on Accounts to report back the resolution which I send to the desk and request its present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized to employ twelve additional laborers in the House folding-room for the purpose of folding speeches, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $720 per annum: Provided, That the said twelve additional employés shall be dropped from the rolls of the Doorkeeper at a period of not more than one month after the expiration of the present session.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the above resolution, respectfully report that they have considered the same and find that the necessity exists for the employment of such additional assistance, and therefore recommend the passage of the resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. I would suggest that this work should be done by lads, not by laborers, which implies grown persons. It can be better done by boys than it can be done by men, and the mode of payment ought to be so much per thousand for the work done, as heretofore. I have no objection to the securing of this work to be done, but I think it can be more efficiently performed in the way I suggest.

Mr. COX, of New York. I answer my friend from Pennsylvania by saying that the plan which he suggests of having the work done by boys at so much a thousand has been tried and was an utter failure. One-half of the speeches were so folded as to be worthless; five hundred out of every thousand stuck together. They found out in the folding-room that the best plan is to get men, who will take some care in this business.

So far as this resolution is concerned, it is the same as was introduced in the last session, and is the customary resolution, as I find by looking back in the RECORD. The Doorkeeper, at my suggestion, this morning has made a little statement of facts, which I will submit to the House, for we are all interested in this matter. There are 25,000 speeches now received daily in that folding-room, and after a little, after a fortnight or so, especially after the Presidential campaign becomes more active, we will have five or ten times as many.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. How many will there be of your tariff speech?

Mr. COX, of New York. Oh, I will not say anything about the tariff. I will inform the gentleman, however, that there are 75,000 copies of my speech now in process of folding, I hope for the general and common weal. I am informed by the Doorkeeper there are 50,000 speeches now in the folding-room waiting to be folded. There are 30,000 books and documents, not speeches, now on hand to be folded which require to be sent to members. An average of 12,000 of these books and documents are being received daily in this immense folding-room.

Mr. KASSON. How many employés are there there?

Mr. COX, of New York. About twenty-five.

Mr. KASSON. How many are employed in folding?

Mr. COX, of New York. I think only four or five now.

Mr. KASSON. What do the rest do?

Mr. COX, of New York. I have a statement here of this work in the last Congress. Mr. Urner, of Maryland, who reported a similar resolution in 1882, said:

There are now, as I am informed by the Doorkeeper and the superintendent of the folding-room, thirty persons employed in folding documents and speeches, and they are distributed and are employed in receiving and sending out the mail direct from the folding department. A great many members of Congress, we are informed, have their documents mailed direct from the folding-room, and do not, therefore, have them sent to their rooms. Four are employed in filling the orders of members. One man is employed in keeping a register of accounts of members in regard to their documents. Then there is one person employed on a speech-book, keeping an account of speeches; one for miscellaneous work, a man-of-all-work around the department, who is considered one of the most important men.

The folding-room is now being filled up, and a greater number of these books and documents will be received from now on. Within the next ten days the Agricultural Reports will be in to the number of 100,000. This statement does not include the reports, &c., that are being constantly received for folding. If, therefore, anything is to be done to utilize this organization for sending out our speeches we must pass the customary resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. Nobody objects to having this work done. But my judgment is, and I believe it is formed upon experience, that it can be better done by boys than by men. And there ought to be a contract limitation. There ought to be a fixed price of $1, $1.25, or $1.50 per thousand, and not a wide discretion to pay any price. The pay of these laborers would be $60 per month. And therefore I suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] an amendment providing that the work shall be done by boys, and that it shall be done at a contract price. From one dollar to a dollar and half per thousand I think would be the right price.

Mr. KASSON. Let it be the usual price heretofore paid.

Mr. RANDALL. I would have it the usual price. But I would like to give these boys this work at any rate.

Mr. KASSON. More work would be done in that way.

Mr. RANDALL. I believe it would be done quicker and better.

Mr. COX, of New York. The Doorkeeper tells me the work can not be done in that way.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not care what the Doorkeeper says. I have been here longer than he has been.

Mr. COX, of New York. And I have been here longer than the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to amend the resolution by striking out "at the rate of $720 per annum" and inserting a provision that boys shall be employed and paid at the usual contract price.

Mr. COX, of New York. What is the usual contract price?

Mr. RANDALL. A dollar or a dollar and a quarter a thousand for speeches, I believe.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It was a dollar a thousand in the Forty-sixth Congress, when boys were employed for the purpose. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that this work was done then by boys. My experience has not gone in the direction of the experience of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX]. So far from finding one-half of the speeches lost by reason of being improperly folded, I have not found that any were lost.

Mr. REED. Can these speeches be folded in the way they were folded in the last Congress at any such price as was paid for folding them in the Forth-sixth Congress? The method used in the Forty-seventh Congress was superior to that in the Forty-sixth Congress.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let the price be fixed at a proper rate and the work will be done properly, if care is exercised in the selection of boys for the purpose when there is work for them to do. I have seen the time when the folders were there with nothing to do, when there were not speeches adequate to the number of employés. And the very same thing will occur under the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] if it is not amended as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL].

Mr. REED. I do not want to interfere in this question of economy, for of course no Republican has any right to do that in this Congress——

Mr. MCMILLIN. And the gentleman has no tendency that way.

Mr. REED. I simply want to say that we do not desire to have any inferior folding done; that is all. That is our department and we have a right to speak about that.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And in that you will meet a concurrent sentiment on this side of the House.

Mr. KASSON. It is a mere matter of the proper construction of the force.

Mr. SPOONER. This resolution provides for a force in the folding-room such as has been heretofore provided in previous Congresses. That force seems to be necessary in order to do the work with which that office is burdened during the long session of each Congress. The Committee on Accounts have examined the matter and believe that this additional force is required, and they have reported back the resolution in the form in which it was submitted to them.

I do not know that the committee has any special desire as to whether men or boys should be employed for this purpose, or whether those employed should be paid at a fixed salary per month or at a contract price. That I think the committee are quite willing to leave to be decided by the judgment of the House. I will move the previous question on the resolution and amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. If the work is to be done under contract, I do not want the number of boys employed to be limited. That will depend upon the amount of work to be done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman proposes simply to employ an additional force.

Mr. RANDALL. A force of lads from time to time sufficient to do the work at a contract price.

Mr. KASSON. Would it not be well also to provide that the terms shall be approved by the Committee on Accounts, so that they may regulate the prices to be paid for different classes of work?

Mr. RANDALL. Very well; I think that is well enough.

Mr. COX, of New York. I hope the amendment will not be adopted, for it will be equivalent to doing nothing to relieve the folding-room from the pressure now upon it. Besides, I am not certain that there is any law fixing a contract price.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think the gentleman should say that my amendment will be equivalent to doing nothing to relieve the pressure upon the folding-room, when I provide for the employment of a sufficient force.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to say that the Committee on Accounts have given this matter some consideration, and agreed to report the resolution as submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX]. But inasmuch as it will cost less to the country to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] than it will to discuss it, I hope the member of our committee having the matter in charge will accept the amendment and let the resolution be passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendment as proposed to be amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized to employ an additional force of boys in the House folding-room for the purpose of folding speeches, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the usual contract price: Provided, That the said additional force of boys shall be dropped from the rolls of the Doorkeeper at a period of not more than one month after the expiration of the present session.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] suggested a further amendment, which was that the contract prices should receive the approval of the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. KASSON. If there is no question as to what the usual contract is that would not be necessary.

Mr. STORM. What is the use of the proviso in the resolution in view of the fact that the work is to be done by contract?

Mr. RANDALL. The latter part of the resolution should be stricken out, so as to have these boys discharged when the work is done.

Mr. KASSON. I think the work will be done by the time named.

Mr. SPOONER. At the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HILL] I withdraw temporarily the demand for the previous question so that he may be heard.

Mr. HILL. I trust the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will not be adopted. Boys were employed in the Forty-sixth Congress for this purpose. They have been employed in this Congress. The other day when we had the Morrison tariff bill printed and distributed to members, when it came to be folded we found laid upon our desks in the same packet a print of the journal of the Reconstruction Committee of the Thirty-ninth Congress, and in some cases they were sent out by members as the tariff bill.

Mr. STORM. I deny that the boys were guilty of that trick of foisting upon members of Congress a document not intended to be sent to them. That was done by somebody connected with the office of the superintendent of the folding-room.

Mr. HILL. I do not say by whom it was done.

Mr. STORM. I do.

Mr. HILL. It is one of those things which may occur whenever boys are employed.

Now, where the work is done at a stipulated price by the thousand, the boys are so anxious to make money rapidly that they get the documents pasted together and mixed up in every conceivable manner. Why not let the Doorkeeper employ a force of competent men to assist him in the folding-room, with instructions to discharge them when he does not need them? We might as well give him discretion in the employment of men as in the employment of boys. What is the difference? I know that these boys in the folding-room do their duty as well as they can; but the trouble is they are crowded too much. Besides, members should recollect that this is the Presidential year; and every member wants to make a campaign speech; so that there will be three times as much work to do as usual.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to that kind of economy which begets negligence in public affairs. It is false economy, and will not do credit to any party here or elsewhere. The Forty-sixth Congress is no criterion by which the work of this Congress can be judged. We have thirty or forty more members here now than there were in the Forty-sixth Congress. We have a larger constituency than members of the Forty-sixth Congress had. It requires more force to do the work of this Congress; and I hope the House will be generous enough to give it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], which, as the Chair understands, includes a proposition to strike out the proviso of the resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir. Let this additional force be employed so long as may be absolutely necessary and no longer. If this force be required for three or four months during the recess, they can be employed.

The SPEAKER. The resolution as proposed to be amended by the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized to employ an additional force of boys in the House folding-room for the purpose of folding speeches, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the usual contract price while employed.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The words "to be approved by the Committee on Accounts" should be added.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon that portion of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania which proposes to strike out the proviso at the end of the resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. That should go out entirely.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative; there being ayes 18, noes not counted.

The question being taken on the remaining portion of the amendment of Mr. RANDALL, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 52, noes 67.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask for the reading of the resolution as modified.

The SPEAKER. It has not been modified. The question is now upon the adoption of the resolution as reported by the committee.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. SPOONER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the morning hour be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill; and pending that motion I move that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the pending appeal be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that debate upon a question of order in Committee of the Whole is a matter within the control of the chairman.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that the House can control this question.

Mr. ELLIS. Then I call for a vote on my original motion.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. WELLBORN in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6092) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.
